The overwhelming defeat of high license in Wisconsin last Tuesday is regarded by the anti-prohibition press as a saloon victory. It is to a narrow vision; but as a wrestler drops to his knee to get a lower and better hold, the cause of true temperance will show this to have been a victory. The pretense of high license to restrain liquor-drinking was long ago exploded. The difference between license low or license high is only that it helps selfish tax-payers. The rule of the saloon will be necessary in some communities for its overthrow, just as the dominecring of the slave power was needed to make a self-seeking nation awake to its danger.

The Postoffice Inspectors arrested a man in Chicago a few days since, for conducting a lottery business and making a fraudulent use of the mails. But lodges and Catholic fairs post their bills openly for raffles, which are lotteries under another, name and no officer of the law is aroused to protest or prevent the business. What State rights' nonsense, by the way, is it that allows the lottery to flourish in Louisiana or Kentucky while elsewhere it is suppressed? Is there not a national regalation or prohibition of this evil as much needed as for divorce, bankruptcy or intemperance?

It has been the vexation of some men's lives that that the seven million horse power of Niagara Falls was going to a perpetual waste doing nothing but roar and foam and furnish the wide world with a stupendous show. These pragmatic gentlemen have been hoping much from the electrical inventors, and not altogether in vain. They have seen the few mills and manufactories put up to catch a little of the wasting power sold out to the State, with the expectation that they will be cleared off and the primeval condition of the awful region restored. But they have a ditch cut years ago from the rapids above the fall which can be made of use outside the State park. This canal now furnishes about 5,000 horse power and which may be greatly increased by enlarging the cut. It is also found practicable to transmit power for electrical purposes from Niagara to Buffalo, a distance of twenty-five miles, with a great saving over the power of steam—a saving of $40,000 per annum on a plant for 1,000 arc lights. It is believed that with improved batteries power can be transmitted 100 or 150 miles and the present generation even may see the prophecy of Sir William Thompson fulfilled and the power of this mighty torrent used in all the large cities of the East.

The Benjamin Rush Temperance Centennial is celebrated this week by the various temperance organizations and several of the religious denominations. A "Centennial Temperance Conference" is appointed in Philadelphia on Wednesday and Thursday, to which a large number of delegates have been elected, and which will be addressed by a number of able speakers. The National Woman's Christian Temperance Union through whose efforts ten States have during the present year adopted temperance instruction in the public schools, is taking a profound interest in this important anniversary, and has arranged for meetings throughout the country wherever it has organizations.

The managers of the new Catholic University at Washington invited, so the German papers report, a somewhat celebrated character, Janssen, from Frankfort on the Main, to be one of their professors. He declined, though offered a salary of 50,000, francs or $10,000. Catholic as well as Protestant America may be congratulated on his decision, since it is believed that his celebrity as an "historian" rests on the sensational attempt to prove from documentary evidence that the condition of all Europe before the Reformation was in the best sense prosperous, and that that mightiest social and religious movement since the days of the early church, was the greatest evil that ever befell the northern and central nations of Europe. An "historian" of such caliber might, in this country, be in danger of losing both character and reputation, if exposed to the rifles of our sham-hunters. If we cannot abide Chinamen, what do we need of such professors of history?

The Chicago Knight Templars are becoming pious. They have long claimed for themselves the Christian name: perhaps it is with compunction for their dilatory practice that at a meeting of the Apollo Commandery last week, when twenty-two candidates were put through the Red Cross degree, during the banquetting that followed till past midnight the speakers were the following "Sir Knights" and "Princes:" G. C. Lorimer, Baptist; Frank M. Bristol, Methodist; Samuel Fallows, Reformed Episcopal bishop; and Clinton Locke, Episcopal canon. The pastor of a Baptist church in this city said the other day that he once had much respect for Lorimer, but when he saw him get the Knight Templar Masons into his church and "go through his monkey tricks with them" he was disgusted with the man and led to doubt the sincerity of his Christian profession.

If Humbolt, Neb., has some of the best people of the earth, it has also some who are their antipodes, who get an occasional inspiration at least, from the bottomless pit. Take for instance this extract from a local paper, which is worse in its way than the eggs thrown by other Masons: "Two ladies were returning home with the ministers when the assault was made. It was certainly very wrong for the parties, whoever they may have been, to administer such severe punishment upon the ladies, and they should be justly punished for it, but the two 'divines' certainly needed all they got, and a dose of tar and feathers in addition would not have been out of place. The lecture which was delivered by one of them in the People's church last Friday evening, was, if properly stated to us, disgraceful, untrue, and obscene in the extreme. The main bent of the discourse seemed to be to abuse the grand old order of Masonry, which stood for a thousand years before this upstart would-be reformer ever breathed the free air of this glorious republic, and will probably be growing in numbers and strength long after he has accepted a position in the infernal regions. It seems to us that parties should be well-known before they are allowed to speak in the pulpit of our churches. Such imposters as these disgrace Christianity, and their influence in the community for bad can hardly be estimated."

Rev. Mr. Parkhurst, in his tour around the world did not see a single new heathen temple. All the pagan worship was in old dilapidated temples. Not very long ago there were 100,000 idol-gods in Raratonga; but a young man lately visiting the British Museum saw among the wonders there the first Raratonga idol his eyes ever beheld, though he was born and lived 19 years in Raratonga.—Intelligencer. There is a warning, as well as a hopeful lesson in such news. So long as we are sure that Satan is not giving up his fight for the dominion of this world, so long we may be sure that he will not abandon his surest means of separating the souls of men from their God; and no reader of Bible history can doubt that this was by false worships. But as Gospel light increases round the earth and the intelligence of men is aroused, the grosser forms of idolatry must be given up and something more nearly counterfeiting the truth substituted. Thus we see the lodge religions flourishing beside the churches and even around their altars. The rude and unseemly rites of barbarous and savage tribes lose their power, but the "beautiful" formulas of the lodge engage the attention of the refined but undiscerning worshiper in Christian lands. Thus the tide falls with us while it rises among the islands of the sea and in lands long shrouded with the darkness of superstition and paganism.

Hon. William H. Barnum, Senator from Connecticut and manager for the Democratic party in the Cleveland campaign last year, in an interview in this city expressed the opinion that the increase of the United States army was a necessity demanding immediate attention, and that garrisons of from 500 to 2,000 men should be permanently stationed in our large cities where outbreaks are liable to occur. As nine out of every ten, at least, of the riots which demand military suppression grow out of strikes, set on foot by secret labor lodges, Mr. Barnum's proposition might be resolved into a kind of government supervision or standing-army regulation of these sources of discontent and disorder. There is a more economical and hopeful solution of this question, and it lies with the Christian church. Let our pulpits demand the practical enforcement of the great rule laid down by Christ for the regulation of human intercourse, especially between the workingman and the employer; and let the churches insist that their membership be clear of secret combinations. We would then find, instead of a demand for standing armies to hold down the workingmen, that a revision of our laws bearing upon the relations of capital and an amicable arbitration of questions difficult to settle would anticipate and prevent such threatening outbreaks as have transpired in a score of cities during the present year.

THE SPIRIT OF CHRIST TRIUMPHS OVER KU-KLUXISM.

LETTER FROM BRO. COUNTEE OF MEMPHIS.

MEMPHIS, Tenn., Sept. 12, 1885.

Editor Cynosure,

DEAR BRO.—I have been kept quite busy since the recent attack made on my house, answering letters, which have numbered as high as five daily. You have no idea how much I have rejoiced during the last three weeks in learning that so many are engaged in this the greatest work of the nineteenth century, and more on account of the love and tenderness shown me by the members of my church, the Tabernacle Baptist, many of whom have avowed their purpose to die by my side, if needs be. I have preached regularly in my church every Sunday since those inhuman monsters visited my house, without any relaxation whatever; and they were loud in saying that I ought to hold up and quit urging people to leave their societies; but by some means I am impelled by a supernatural influence to cry aloud and spare not, to preach the gospel of SEPARATION FROM THE WICKED.

Last Sunday night was my first Sabbath out at night since the second Sabbath in August, and I talked to a large congregation. It was indeed a jubilee to my soul. My subject was, "A bound Jesus." (John 18: 12.) And the Lord helped me; and, as I never preach now, or as I call it, cast out my net without seeing how many fish are in it, I rejoiced greatly to see five of my people leave their secret organizations and take their stand with the church.

After services I was escorted to my home, nearly a mile from the church, by almost the entire congregation, and I shall never, never forget how my heart swelled within me as they marched with almost death-like stillness to my door, and then how I was almost carried into the door where five or six were watching to keep the enemies from slipping up and burning my home as they have threatened to do.

There are only three ministers who have spoken at all on this subject: Elder B. A. Imes, a Congregationalist, Elder Brinkley and myself who are Baptists. Neither of the others have been molested; but they attacked me for two reasons: first, I suppose, because I was so diminutive, being only 4 feet 10 inches tall and weighing 105 pounds; Bro. Brinkley being a 200 pounder, and Bro. Imes about 150. The other reason was because I was an active society man, belonging to the Masons, a Knight Templar; in the Odd-fellows, a Past Grand Master; in the I. O. I.s (Imaculates), a Knight of Orient; in the Tabernacles, a Knight of Taber; and a Knight of Pythias. Hence you see in all I had gone to the rank of Knighthood. I was sought by them, initiated privately, and given all the degrees for my influence, which I gave in return. In all their grand affairs I was generally chief spokesman, and they knew that my influence turned against them would be felt, and I must be stopped, and the getting rid of me would, as they thought, put an end to the whole matter. For seventeen years I have been an earnest worker in the cause of secret organizations. I was indeed deluded. I imagined I was of great importance, to be sought and initiated into their so-called mysteries FREE OF CHARGE.

The awakening, thank God, is greater than the delusion. I rejoice greatly that I am found worthy to suffer persecution for Christ's sake. The clouds of vengeance yet hang heavily over me, and I am expecting an attack at any time. My people are guarding my house every night, and are anxious to get me a house in town where I shall not have so much to fear from another assault from these men, many of whom are Christians, or at least profess to be, and who seem to believe they are justified in committing the crime of murder.

I am undaunted in my purpose to go on. Some few of my members remain under the ban of society delusion. I am trying to be patient with all, and in due time I believe they will come out from among them. I do not think that the society people have seen their blunder, but it is no doubt working against them. Many persons will leave them. I shall try and occasionally drop you a line on the situation of affairs here. May Christian people everywhere pray for us. R. N. COUNTEE.

BALAAM STILL TEMPTING ISRAEL.

BY WILLIAM FENTON.

A "Sir Knight"(?) conducted the Y. M. C. A. prayer meeting yesterday in St. Paul, and during his remarks stated that "Balaam could not prevail with God to curse Israel." But if this mock Sir Knight was not blind drunk spiritually with his lodge demonism, he might see that as Balaam did contrive a plan whereby the Israelites did bring the curse of God upon themselves, so to-day God's people, by mingling at the communion services with the modern Moabites of the lodge, are preparing the way for God's curse upon themselves.

In that model of all lodges, the Masonic lodge, we see "the point within the circle," that symbol of the Moabitic abomination, the Moabitic god, Baal Peor, the symbol of the sun, and the ancient phallic and sun-worship essentially imitated. The Israelites by running after that abomination and bowing to the worship of Baal incurred the fierce anger of the Lord, whereby 24,000 of them were slain.

And are not modern churches, by reason of their fellowship with the followers after Baal in the modern secret lodge, and thus defying the commandments of the New Testament, provoking similar judgments? Surely, yes. If God did not wink at iniquity then, why should we suppose that he does now? Every man who joined himself to Baal Peor was slain, and their heads hung up against the sun. But it was not until Phineas arose in the congregation and with a javelin he thrust through the parts symbolized by "the point within the circle" in a prince of Israel and a daughter of a prince of the Midianites, whereby both the prince and the daughter were slain, that the plague was stayed and the wrath of God turned away from Israel. Thus Balaam did succeed in bringing the curse of God upon Israel.

And, again, in the letter to the church at Pergamos (Rev. 2: 14), we read, "Thou hast there them that hold the doctrine of Balaam, who taught Balak to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel." Now, what is our "Sir Knight" doing? He wears his secret society badge side by side with his Y. M. C. A. badge, introducing himself and secret order to all the young men who visit the Y. M. C. A. rooms. Is not that similar to the work of Balaam, casting a stumbling-block before the young men of the city, seducing them into his secret abominations? The readers of the Cynosure know what he will do with them if he gets them into that secret lodge room.

What shall we do? Let us not despair, God reigns. "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal," like that of Phineas, "but spiritual and mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds." 2 Cor. 10: 4. If they cast us out, and even silence us in the churches, we have our closets for prayer, and there we can fight and win the battle. If they cast us into prison, there we can also pray and sing praises to God. They will not always be able to "vex" us "with their wiles," whereby they "beguile" the young men into their secret abominations. And we may save some from the dark and loathsome lodge if we do not give way to despair.

St. Paul, Minn.

THE UNREVEALABLE.

BY D. VANDEVENTER.

Masons say there are secrets in Masonry that cannot be revealed. This proves their heathen origin.

Paul found at Athens an altar dedicated to the unknown God. Those poor, benighted heathen could not solve the mystery; to them it was unrevealable; and in their blindness each one bowed to a god fashioned by his own fancy. As the heathen did, so do Masons. "And now they sin more and more, and have made them * * idols according to their own understanding." Hosea 13: 2. This is the case in which Masons are found: each one has a god of his own, as Masonry does not and dare not accept the God revealed in the Bible as its God; and for anything that Masonry teaches he is, or may be, one of those evil gods who was supposed to be the creator of the material worlds, or that great Brahma who bursted the wonderful mundane egg and brought forth the worlds in all their grandeur. This is one of the unrevealables of Masonry.

To further prove this point take the teaching of the great Pythagoras, whom Masons claim as a brother. He was a heathen philosopher, and to get some idea of the god he worshiped let us turn to the American Cyclopedia, Vol. 14, P. 120: "The essence of number is unity, which is at once odd and even, and contains in itself in germ all the universe. It is both the form and substance of all things, and is identical with the Deity." Pythagoras was an idol worshiper and as Masons claim a brotherhood with him, his god must be their god, and hence the Grand Architect of Masons may be the "essence of number." No wonder Masons claim there is an unrevealable mystery connected with that sublimely ridiculous and heathen-like institution.

Another thing Masonry either dare not, or cannot reveal, is how they expect to "purify man's evil nature" without the blood of Christ. Or how they expect to "rescue man from the world in whose obscurity he has been wandering." See "Manual of the Lodge" by Mackey, P. 39. Or how the "gavel" is to fit a man for heaven while Christ is rejected. Manual, p. 35. Or how it is to completely accomplish the new birth" (Manual, p. 21), while it rejects Christ "and treats his blood as an unholy thing?" Hebrews 10: 29.

The foregoing quotation may suffice to show where the unrevealable of Masonry lies, and establish its sacrilegious claims beyond the possibility of a successful refutation. Masonry arrogates to itself power that belongs exclusively to the blood of Christ.

In II Timothy 3d chapter we read of a class of "blasphemers" who are "ever learning and never able to come to a knowledge of the truth." In Mackey's Manual of the Lodge, page 93, we read that a "Mason's wages are truth;" that that the Mason is "ever to be in search of truth, but is never to find it." Truth then is a secret hid from Masonic eyes, therefore Masons cannot reveal it.

We are then forced to the conclusion that Masonry is a tissue of lies. "They that observe lying vanities forsake their own mercy." Jonah 2: 8. But for Masons to say Masonry is not exposed in the books published is to deny a fact. Morgan, Bernard, Ronayne, and others give Masonry substantially as I learned it in the lodge. Therefore, I know that Masonry is exposed.

DR. CHARLES JEWETT ON THE SECRET TEMPERANCE ORDERS.

Another movement, which lost us the active co-operation of thousands of excellent and able men, was the substitution of close for open organizations. Prior to the formation of the order of Sons of Temperance, all our public meetings were open to the world. There was no ritual to control the order of public services which was determined by surrounding circumstances. The opening exercises, after the president of the society had called the meeting to order, were generally, prayer, the reading of the minutes, or the record of the last meeting and the reading of reports, if special duties had been assigned to committees. These services did not usually consume more than twenty minutes of the evening. The remainder was devoted to a free discussion of the subject of temperance by interested parties, unless provision had been made for a regular lecture, in which case, of course, that service had precedence. But whether the evening hours were occupied with the lecture or a general discussion, all was in the hearing of the masses.

I have worked in good faith for years with and for Sons of Temperance and Good Templars, believing, all the while, that open societies would serve our purpose better, and that their re-establishment, with the addition of a proper financial feature, would be found to be a necessity before a triumph can be reached. I saw, however, that close organizations must have a trial, and a thorough one, before the earnest and excellent brethren, working in and through them, could be made to see the necessity of other forms. They have been tried for nearly twice the period during which we worked in open organizations, and for one, I think it time to look at the facts as they are, and, instead of an obstinate adherence to existing and partial methods only, see if some measures cannot be devised for bringing our whole force into the field.

Seven-eighths of our weekly temperance meetings now are held in private rooms. Few of the aged are there to give the proceedings the dignity and gravity which their presence generally confers, and the children are left at home; and worst of all, the drinking portion of the community, the very portion which we wish to influence by our arguments and appeals, are excluded. They have not the pass-word.

What a blow would be struck at Christianity, if, from the regular meetings of the sanctuary or the weekly meeting for religious conference, sinners were excluded, ueless they came with the pass-word, or would declare beforehand their readiness to join the church. At the close of the exercises in open societies, you can take advantage of any good impressions made to get men to join the society, which they can do on the spot by signing the pledge of abstinence, it being a part of the constitution, and from that moment the pledged man is a member. In close organizations, considerable time must elapse and certain ceremonies intervene, before membership is attained.

Once more. Those petty rivalries which are now frequently occurring between the different orders, where they exist in the same community, and often between subordinate and neighboring organizations of the same order; and those unbrotherly strifes for offices and honors, which too often occur now, were unknown in the open organizations, absolutely unknown. No doubt, my brethren who have embraced the cause within the last twenty-five years, and never worked in open societies at all, will be surprised at these utterances; but men, past fifty, who worked in the open societies which existed in New England by thousands before the year 1840, will fully understand me; such men as Senator Wilson of Massachusetts, Gov. Buckingham of Connecticut, Neal Dow of Maine, and Amos C. Barstow of Rhode Island, and thousands of others past the age of fifty. Let our younger brethren, before they express their unbelief in the historical truth of my statements, ask such men, and I am willing that their statements shall stand, whether for my justification or condemnation. How far they were effective, let the facts tell. In less than fifteen years, the style of operations I have described, so far revolutionized the public opinion of Massachusetts that the license system was abolished in more than three-fourths of the counties of the State. The old style of operating gave place, in the years 1840, '41, and '42, to the Washingtonian System, and that very soon to the Sons of Temperance and other forms of close organization, and they have had the field almost exclusively for over twenty-five years; and what is the present status of temperance in that State as compared with what it was in 1843? It may be doubted whether we are stronger at the polls now than we were twenty-five years ago. If we have gained at all, it is but a slight gain to have been secured by twenty-five years of labor, even with whatever of hindrance may have fallen in our path. For myself, I believe as firmly as I believe any fact that I cannot absolutely demonstrate, that, had the work of reform been prosecuted for the last twenty-five years in New England in open organizations, with such added provisions as experience might have suggested, the liquor traffic would have been crushed before the public attention could have been diverted from that issue by the great struggle for the preservation of the Union.

A MASONIC SECRET.

While it is true that the barbarous ceremonies and oaths of Freemasonry are no longer a secret, we are free to admit that there are some secrets deposited in the historic archives of the fraternity which have not yet been fully revealed. Freemasonry tried to keep the secrets, and swear down the facts in the case of Wm. Morgan who was Masonically kidnapped and murdered by the blood-thirsty, midnight conspirators, but the ghost of Morgan would not down, and the investigation instituted by the legislature of the State of New York clearly evidenced that Freemasonry stole one of its citizens and spirited him away to his death doom. Though some Masons were condemned to a few months' imprisonment for complicity in the infamous crime, none were ever hanged as they should have been. For this crime the institution was hung as high as Haman with its own cable-tow, but in some way the putrescent carcass has been cut down and resurrected on the fine points of Masonic blood-and-murder fellowship. There is at least one Masonically-kept secret we would like very much to know, and that is, what became of Rev. Ensign B. Hill, a minister who belonged to the Allegheny Conference of the Wesleyan Methodist Connection. Brother Hill had been a Freemason, and of course had renounced his blasphemous and murderous obligations as is necessary is order to membership in our connection of churches. It was known that he had written an expose of the diabolical institution as far as he had gone and intended its publication. To consummate his purpose he took his manuscript, and with his horse and buggy started for a village some miles away where there were facilities for such work, intending to have his manuscript printed. On that journey he forever disappeared from sight or knowledge of his friends and the conference to which he belonged. For several successive sessions of the Allegheny Conference his name was called, but no "track or trace" of their missing member answered to the solemn roll-call. The last that was ever seen of him was on that fatal journey with his manuscript exposing the abominations of Masonry, which he was now about to have published and for which purpose he was driving across the country toward the village where he expected to secure the printing of his book. The last sight of him by any but the fraternity of such wondrous charity, was toward nightfall in the company of two Freemasons. From that fatal moment the impenetrable pall of darkness fell upon his pathway. Ensign B. Hill was never seen nor heard of more. Even his horse and buggy were never found; "no track or trace of remembrance," to speak Masonically, was ever had of "so vile and perjured a wretch" of a horse and buggy as could assay to carry Masonic secrets to a printer's office for publication and sale in the open market. As far as the circumstances connected with "the accursed taking off" of Ensign B. Hill, a Wesleyan minister, is concerned, that is a Masonic secret remaining "secure and inviolable" in the breast of the brotherhood to this "year of light, 1885." As a representative of the Wesleyan Methodist Connection of America, one of whose ministers has disappeared under such circumstances, we lift our voice of inquiry in the ears of Freemasonry and inquire: Where is Ensign B. Hill? When and where and by whom was the death penalty of the lodge executed upon him? Was Masonic vengeance carried out to the letter in cutting his throat across? by tearing open his left breast and taking the heart and vitals from thence and casting them over his left shoulder? by severing his body in twain and dividing it to the north and south and burning the bowels to ashes in the center and scattering the ashes to the four winds of heaven? or was some other method adopted, as in the case of Morgan, to carry out the spirit of murder breathed in the fraternal obligations of this institution of wonderful benevolence? For the sake of kindred and friends, for the sake of the church and conference of which he was an honored member, where, O where, is Ensign B. Hill, if living, and where sleeps his remains if dead? Will not the brotherhood as much as point a silent finger at the place of his mortal repose that we may erect a monument to the memory of our martyred brother? No voice or "sign" from the inner sanctuary of the lodge answers our piteous appeal. Never say again that Freemasonry has no secrets. It has secrets dark as ever reveled in the midnight caves of professional banditti, or stalked the deck of a pirate craft.—Wesleyan Methodist.

HENRY WILSON AND WENDELL PHILLIPS.

[John R. French in the North American Review for September.]

Early in his life at Natick, Wilson had organized among his fellow-mechanics a debating society, of which he was an active member. It met on one evening every week for the discussion, usually, of such questions as were agitating the public mind. It was in this humble association that he learned that plain, simple, straightforward way of presenting his argument which characterized his speeches and debates in his subsequent career. He also persuaded his fellow-students at Concord to form a similar association, of which, also, he was the most active spirit. His first appearance as a public speaker was under these circumstances. In 1837, and a few subsequent years, the young men of New Hampshire had a State association, devoted to the interests of the rising movement against negro slavery. The membership of the association was found chiefly in the schools of the State, the college at Hanover, and the academies at Exeter, Plainfield, New Hampton, Concord, Gilmanton, New London, and Pembroke. With their contributions these boys kept one or two eloquent lecturers in the field, and annually held at the capital a rousing State convention of two or three days' duration. In August, in the year in which Wilson was in attendance at the Concord school, this association held its annual gathering, to which he had been elected as one of the delegates from the branch association of that town. It was largely attended by many spirited and noble young men, who, in the intervening years, have become distinguished as leaders in the progress of the times.

Stephen S. Foster was there, a man of considerable intellectual force, who, through all the years of the anti-slavery conflict, rendered the most faithful and self-sacrificing services. But at this convention—and it was a common habit with him—he allowed his zeal to outrun his discretion. He introduced a resolution severely censuring John Quincy Adams for some recent utterance in Congress, wherein that noble old man had not come quite up to the high-water mark of the more advanced anti-slavery sentiment. During the previous year young Wilson had been in Washington, and had made the acquaintance of Mr. Adams, for whom he had a high admiration, especially for the single-handed fight he was making against the slave power. He believed, therefore, that the venerable statesman deserved the hearty approval and encouragement of the anti-slavery people of the North, and not their censure, even if he did apparently halt at some points of their faith. A young man from Dartmouth College, Horace Eaton (afterward well-known as a warm-hearted and philauthropic Presbyterian clergyman), spoke earnestly against the resolution, and was followed by Henry Wilson in his first public speech. Wilson was always modest, and in those days he was bashful. He felt that the passage of the resolution would be a great wrong, but he shrank from participation in the debate. However, entreated and encouraged by a friend at his side, he timidly rose to his feet, and I had the pleasure of telling the president his name—as it was called for—slightly to Wilson's confusion. But he was soon under good headway, for his most earnest feelings were enlisted. His opening remarks evidently commanded the attention of the convention, and it was not many minutes before he began to secure applause from all sides, as he spoke eloquently of the intrepidity of the venerable ex-President making his brave fight almost alone in the midst of the most defiant opposition. He pleaded for words of cheer from the generous young men of New Hampshire, and opposed this attempt to inflict a pharisaical censure. It was really a grand speech, and the applause that continued till he took his seat, while testifying that the convention was with him, gave him, also, great encouragement in his determination to become a public speaker.

While Wilson was thus addressing the audience, a young man, an Apollo in manly grace and beauty, entered the church; a stranger, evidently, as no one seemed to recognize him, and he took a seat near the door, in the rear of the audience. As Wilson closed, this young man joined heartily in the applause—indeed, he seemed to lead it. Rising and coming forward, he asked if a stranger, not a member of the convention, nor a citizen of the State, even, but deeply interested in the discussion, might be permitted to join in the debate. That silvery voice and princely presence would have commanded a welcome in any gathering, but among these young men came voices from all over the hall, which proffered him the freedom of the platform with a cordial greeting. The president asked his name. "Wendell Phillips," was the response. Those only who are old enough to remember how hated and despised was the anti-slavery cause in its early days, and how the peerless eloquence and patrician rank of this young Bostou lawyer, this son of her first mayor, this noblest member of one of her oldest and most honored families, whose deeds of virtue and munificent charities had made illustrious every era of Massachusetts' history, had lifted up that cause from this hate and reproach—they only can imagine the euthusiastic salutation which shook that church on the announcement of his name. Every member of the convention sprang to his feet to assure Wendell Phillips that he was welcome. More than forty years have come and gone since that August day—years crowded with great historical events—yet still that scene of welcome remains as vivid in my miud as if it had occurred but yesterday.

Mr. Phillips made one of his rarest speeches—first, in warm praise of the generous spirit and practical sense of the eloquent young mau who had last addressed the convention, and then in glowing eulogy of the "old man eloquent," the brave champion, in Congress, of free speech, and of the right of petition. At his close, Mr. Phillips made his way to the pew in which Mr. Wilson was seated, and, taking him warmly by the hand, repeated to him, personally, what he had said to the convention his most hearty approval of what had fallen from his lips—and assured him of his pleasure in making his acquaintance. From that time dated a warm friendship between these two men destined to play conspicuous parts in the history of the country; and from that cordial approval of the great anti-slavery crator, and the applause of those hearty young Abolitionists, sprang the open and public attachment of Henry Wilson to the anti-slavery cause, which never once faltered until Abraham Lincoln, grasping in his strong right hand the power of a million armed men, smote the monster to the earth.

Never count a temptation so triumphed over, so beaten off that it will never assault you any more. Satan has been called Beelzebub, or the god of flies, some tell us, because he comes back again and again; because it is impossible to drive him away that he will not return. Consider the Lord of glory himself. When the tempter, thrice encountered and thrice defeated in the wilderness left him, it was ouly as we are expressly told, "for a season." There were other hours and powers of darkness still to come, when the priuce of this world should make further proof in the garden whether there was not something which he could claim for his own even in that Lord, who had so foiled and baffled him iu the desert. And shall we think that when he departs from us it is not more than for a reason? Never so long as you bear about these sinful bodies, count any corruption to be so dead in you that you are perfectly safe from it henceforth, that it can never stir or trouble you again. How much that seems dead will be shown by sad experience to have been only sleeping; like snakes, which, frozen in winter, lose for a time their power to harm, appear as though there were no life in them, but brought to the warmth, can hiss and sting again. How many an old corruption is, perhaps, at this momeut thus torpid and inactive in us, which yet only awaits the returning warmth of a suitable temptation to revive in all its maliguant strength anew.—Trench.

REFORM NEWS.

CITY WORK.

CHICAGO, Saturday, Sept. 19, 1885.

Readers of the Cynosure will be glad to know that our cause is advancing here as elsewhere.

During the past three days I have visited the pastors of several German and Swedish churches, and find them almost universally opposed to the lodge, so far as they are conversant with its workings. They do not endeavor to learn the opinion of their members and preach according to these opinions, as some of their American brethren; but taking the simple Word of God as guide, they walk in the light, warning their people against all societies which "love darkness rather than light."

I have just come from a conference of the Swedish Baptist ministers, which is being held in the First Swedish Baptist church. Here I had the pleasure of meeting representatives of that society from many of the States. Rev. John Nelson, of Austin, Texas; Rev. John Swanson, of La Porte, Ind.; Rev. Nathaniel Smith, of Hamilton, N. Y.; Rev. E. Lundin, of Tremont Temple, Boston; and Rev. A. B. Orgren, of Stromburg, Neb., were among those present from a distance. Through the courtesy of the pastor, though their time was very limited, I was allowed a few minutes to speak of our work. At the close of the meeting several gave their names for the Cynosure.

Bro. A. B. Orgren, secretary of a new Theological Seminary which the society is building in Stromburg, Neb., gave me many interesting facts concerning their work. He said, "We shall conduct our Seminary on Anti-masonic principles. Our president, Rev. J. A. Edgren, was denounced by Dr. G. W. Northrop, president of the Baptist Seminary in this city, chiefly because he was an Anti-mason. We have forty acres of land out there, ten thousand four hundred dollars in cash, and a new building which we hope to occupy Nov. 15th next." This sounds good for Nebraska.

Rev. H. Wunder, pastor of St. Paul's (Lutheran German) church, will consult with the other pastors of his denomination and see if they will co-operate in the general convention of anti-secret churches.

Rev. J. L. Meier, pastor of the First German Baptist church, was very glad to hear of our work and cordially invited me to speak to the young men of his church on next Wednesday evening, which invitation, of course, I accepted.

Rev. Philip DeBey, pastor of the Dutch Reformed church, said that he had just returned from a conference of the churches of his denomination, and that they took as strong ground against the lodge as ever. He thought that there were a "few narrow minded" among them that did not oppose it. The conference ordered 5,000 pages of tracts in their own language to be printed for the benefit of such. They will co-operate in a convention of anti-secret churches. More anon. W. B. STODDARD.

THE HUMBOLDT, NEB., MEETING.

HUMBOLDT, Neb., Sept. 10, 1885.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Something out of the usual order of things here has come to pass, and I hasten to tell you what and how. Last May an effort was made to hold a National Reform convention here by the agent. The Lord had a few friends ready to welcome and a place ready for him to begin work. The People's Church was offered for that purpose. He preached for us on Sabbath morning and at the M. E. church at night. A good impression was made. On Monday the pastors of the churches met by request, to consult and make the necessary arrangements. But the thing did not meet with extraordinary favor. Some other time would be better. The point was yielded for the present. Later in the season would be the better time, when due notice would be given. At length the notice came to all the pastors, fixing the time of the convention and asking their co-operation. Bros. Gault and R. Smith were promptly on hand, when they were informed no announcements of the meeting had been made in the churches and there would be no co-operation by the pastors. Such is the previous history. By mere silence and standing aloof, embarassment and defeat were intended. It was an emergency sprung upon us, only to be met unhesitatingly. Co-operation if not to be had here, should be imported, and the work of the convention, possibly, broadened and deepened by the means.

That day, Sept. 3d, Secretary Stoddard was telegraphed to come. The next morning he reported in person at the depot. I met him there. Never did such gladness fill my heart on meeting any stranger as on meeting him, in view of the object of his coming and the ends to be ultimately attained by it. A consultation was had, in which our fears, if we had any, took no part. Trusting in the Lord of hosts, it was decided to appoint meetings, and handbills were scattered over town. On Friday and Saturday night fair audiences, not large on account of heavy rains, gathered to hear Secretary Stoddard. A good sprinkling of secretists were present; among them the Worshipful Master and he a Jew. In the first lecture, by means of charts, he opened the door of the lodge, and took us—Masons and all—right inside. He showed us the way through the three degrees, in a manner that secured the most respectful attention, with no signs of disturbance. Those of us who had never traveled the road before, will not soon forget the objects seen and the scenes described. In the second lecture the climax was reached, the subject being the Masonic covenant and its influence on the home. It was contrasted with God's covenant with Israel, and characterized as being the covenant spoken of in Isaiah 28: 18. This was a heavy blow dealt upon the head of the beast. A gentleman, after the lecture, said he could not have believed the statements made but for the countenances of the Masons. For a wonder, good order prevailed during all the exercises.

Wishing, however, to give a faithful account, I must not omit an incident reminding one of the early days of anti-slavery. As the brethren were on the way to their lodgings in company with friends, some persons suddenly issued from an old building, armed with rotten eggs. The rest may be imagined. A convincing argument this, showing the inwardness of Masonic institutions to be as represented in the lecture. It will help on the good cause. These meetings closed Sabbath evening with an impressive Gospel sermon by Bro. Stoddard before a large audience—a most fitting close. Elder Smith followed with pungent words, who also did excellent service at other times. Bro. Gault presented his cause in the early part of the convention and left Saturday for some point farther west. Thus has been inaugurated, sooner than I had believed possible, work here against secretism. Once begun it must needs be carried on. Continuous work it should be. Thus far no blood shed, no bones broken and nobody badly frightened. Courage, everybody! Right here comes up the question, shall the People's Church and Rev. Joel S. Kelsey, its pastor, be sustained by the friends of general reform? We anxiously wait to hear and know. In hope, yours,

WILLIAM C. BISSELL.

WHICH OUGHT TO DIE FIRST, THE SECRET OR THE RUM POWER?

MARYVILLE, Mo., Sept. 12, 1885.

To that Class of Reformers which needs no Reforming,

BELOVED:—The question above is a vital one. Until of late I have been of the opinion we had better lay away in the grave of forgetfulness first, the rum demon. But as I am out on the front line of all reforms, have found an argument in favor of laying them both aside at one and the same time; though I am not very particular which dies first, for I am fully satisfied of the fact that in due time they must both surely die, or our grand old Republic must go down in general crash. These two institutions cannot live in a free and independent country like ours. We have any amount of proof to fully establish this fact.

In this short letter I will bring forth the one plain and simple proof given at our last convention, held at Humboldt, Neb., 4th and 5th of this month. There were three of us reformers present: Bro. J. P. Stoddard, who is at the head of the anti-secret reform; Bro. M. A. Gault, on the front of the National Reform work; and myself. While I am with these brethren with all my might in those reforms, I never forget in all places, at all times, and under all circumstances, to bring to the front the national prohibition movement. After Bro. Gault had finished his work at Humboldt he left. Bro. Stoddard was true to his calling, and in consequence of his faithfulness in exposing the evils and dangers of these secret powers, I was stopped in my temperance work! This opened my eyes for the first time as to the necessity and great importance of this double funeral. For it is plain to my mind if these common and general foes to God and all mankind cannot be put out of the way, or forever set aside, separately, then we must lay them side by side, in one and the same open grave. Sometimes I think it will cost less to bury them at one time.

You will be anxious to know just how that thing went at Humboldt. In few words you will see this is a very plain case. On Saturday 5th, at 3: 30 p. m., Bro. Stoddard and I went on the same spot where I had stood months before and preached on the public square in Humboldt, when the city officer told me "to give it to them," and he would make the crowd be still: he having heard me before on national prohibition. It made a stir among the lovers of strong

CORRESPONDENCE.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—The vacation in Washington is practically ended. The cool weather has brought the return of most of the absent pastors and of the President, who with renewed vigor settles down to official work. Meanwhile there have been influences at work that have taken no vacation. There has been, and still is, a large amount of crime, mainly of violence, and attended with resistence to lawful officers—crime that is largely chargeable to the liquor traffic, which has shown no signs of abatement. Some drinking men have been brought under Christian influences and reformed, but the number of intoxicated persons that are to be met in the street is as great as at any former period. To the credit of our police force it may be said that there is a general disposition to enforce the law; so much so that the liquor dealers are endeavoring to strike back. They have formed a "protective association," raised funds, appointed a committee, and made an appeal to the District Commissioners against the police. They say that a wrong done to any one of the liquor dealers must be resisted as though it had been done to all. They have, it is said, sought the services of Senator Voorhees to defend their cause. Exactly what their grievances are, it would be difficult to say, unless it is that their violations of law have not been openly winked at. It is a matter of congratulation that the issue between the liquor dealers and the people is fairly made up, and that the party that defies both human and Divine law, is, as in the slave-holders' rebellion, to take the aggressive. Any restriction of the traffic will be regard as an invasion of personal rights and the simple question is shall the traffic be perfectly free or wholly prohibited?

Quite in contrast with this is the course of some of our officials in reference to Sabbath observance. It has been the law and custom here to have all public buildings closed on the Sabbath. They are closed to all citizens, but there is an evident desire to conciliate a powerful organization which has votes if not principles. The following from the Evening Star, of Monday, the 7th, illustrates this:

VISITING KNIGHTS OF LABOR.—Four hundred Knights of Labor of Richmond visited Washington yesterday, arriving on a special train at four o'clock. They were met by committees of the Washington Knights. They were entertained at Ahner's, and subsequently escorted to the various points of interest about the city. At the request of Gen. Rosecrans, Architect Clarke opened the Capitol for their benefit. In the afternoon a reception was held at Odeon Hall. During the visit a presentation was made of a gavel made from one of the pillars of the old Libby prison to District Master Workman Considine for use in D. A. No. 66. The visitors left for home at eight o'clock. The entertainment of the visitors was in charge of a committee, comprising Messrs. Fallon, De Akers, Myers, Bisbee, Dickson, Herbert, Traylor, Fay, and Powell, of the Washington assembly.

Let friends of the Sabbath take note.

The religious interest at the Central Union Mission at 909 Pennsylvania avenue, N. W., still continues with unabated interest. So also do the street meetings at Market place, as well as those conducted by the Salvation Army. Numerous conversions of persons of all classes are of frequent occurrence. Many who have heretofore been victims of intemperance or promoters of other iniquities are now earnest and faithful in Gospel work.

Nor has the influence on professed Christians been less marked and beneficent. Sectarianism has disappeared from among those who have devoted themselves to this work. Theatre-going, tobacco-using, and lodgery are having a decided set back, and the joy of believers in legitimate Christian work is taking the place of those entertainments that are earthly, sensual, and devilish. The Salvation Army has just commenced labor in Alexandria, and there is every indication of a wide-spread and blessed work of grace. May the Lord hasten it in his time.

H. H. HINMAN.

A GOOD TEMPLAR DEFENCE.

MADISON, Wis., Sept. 14, 1885.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN CYNOSURE:—Some kind friend has sent me a copy of your paper of the 10th inst., for which I am very thankful. I have read it with great care, and with much of its contents I find myself in hearty sympathy. I was especially pleased with the spirit of an article from J. T. Sutor, entitled, "Have Charity;" but with the letter of your correspondent, O. F. Lumry, from Lake Bluff, I have considerable fault to find. In speaking of Good Templars' day at Lake Bluff, he says, "We failed to hear the great speech of the occasion by the pope of the order, John B. Finch. I use the term 'pope' because it was put into my mouth by that patriarch and worshiper of the order, Hon. Samuel Hastings, of Wiseonsin. He said that he himself had for some years filled the same position, and that there was but one man in the whole world who held a like position, and that was the pope of Rome."

There are various ways of stating a fact. A fact may be repeated so as to convey a very different impression from what was intended by the person who first stated it. If a politician who wished to make a point against a political opponent had made the statement quoted above, I would have thought nothing of it, but I am surprised to find it in a paper of the character of yours. If your correspondent had stated in what connection I made the comparison between the head of the order of Good Templars and the "pope" it would have been fair, and no one could have found fault. There are a great many things about the "pope" that are very objectionable to the readers of your paper, and in reading the statement of your correspondent no one would know but I claimed or at least admitted that there were things about the head of the order of Good Templars that were equally objectionable. I was speaking of the extent of the order, that it existed all over the civilized globe, and that unlike any other organization that I knew of, with the exception, perhaps, of the Romish church, it had one central head; that the authority of that head was the same in Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia, as it was in the State in which he resided. As you know all about the order, you know what that authority is: you know that it is as unlike that of the "pope" as light is from darkness.

Your correspondent then goes on as follows: "The claims of the order as set forth contradicted my distinct recollection of facts. We were given to understand that the fundamental principles of the order were total abstinence for the individual and prohibition for the State. How this accords with the fact that there are lodges, and so far as I can learn a large number of them, in which almost none of the members vote for prohibition, and members go through the ceremonies so drunk that they cannot stand erect without leaning on others, I cannot quite understand."

He then goes on to make some statements about a lodge in Medusa, N. Y., where the members failed to live up to the principles of the order as I stated them. Suppose some infidel should reason thus: "The claims of the Christian church as set forth by its friends contradicted my recollection of facts. We are given to understand that the fundamental principles of the church are supreme love to God and equal love to man. How this accords with the fact that there are churches, and so far as I can learn a large number of them, in which almost all the members show by their conduct that they have no real love to God or to their fellow men, I cannot quite understand." Suppose he should then refer to some particular church where the spirit of discord and hate had been specially manifest; would you regard this as conclusive evidence that the Christian church was false to its fundamental principles and unworthy of the support of all good people? Is the reasoning any better in the one case than in the other?

I know nothing of the particular lodge to which your correspondent alludes, but I am well aware that there are many lodges and many Good Templars that are no honor to the order with which they are connected, and it is quite likely that just such things as your correspondent describes may sometimes have been witnessed, but if so they are very rare exceptions. I have been connected with the order nearly thirty years. I have been its chief executive officer six years, and I have visited lodges in all parts of the world: in nearly every State and Territory in the United States; in Canada; in England, Ireland, and Scotland; in the Sandwich Islands; in Australia, New Zealand, and Tasmania; and I never saw or heard of any such doings as your correspondent describes.

Your correspondent quotes Dr. Jewett and others, and adds his own testimony to prove that the "secret orders" have "choked it"—the temperance cause—"to death;" and he "charitably" expresses the hope that "when professed temperance men now make statements contrary" to this that "they are not acquainted with the recorded facts."

I am certainly thankful for his "charity" as I shall need it, as I do deny most emphatically the truth of the statement that the Good Templars at least have "choked the temperance cause to death."

Pardon me for a few words of personal history. I came upon the stage of life during the Anti-masonic excitement. I was a resident of Philadelphia while Joseph Ritner was Governor of the State of Pennsylvania, elected, as you are aware, as an Anti-mason. I was a thorough Anti-mason in all my views and feelings. So strong were my objections to secret societies that when the Sons of Temperance came into existence I refused to unite with the order for several years, and was finally indueed to waive my objections because in the place I then resided—Geneva, in this State—there was a bitter fight in progress between the friends of temperance and the liquor dealers, and I found all the active friends of the cause were in this organization, and I could not fully co-operate with them unless I united with the Division. Some few years after I united with the Good Templars. I have been connected with the order ever since. I think I know as mueh about the order and its workings as any man living. I have some standing as a Christian, as an anti-slavery man, as a Sabbath-school man, as a temperance man, and as a friend of everything that will honor God and promote the welfare of my fellowmen, and I wish to place behind the statement I am about to make all the influence that the record of more than fifty years of active life in trying to do good has given me. The statement is this: That during the nearly thirty years I have been connected with the order of Good Templars, while I have known of an immense deal of good having been accomplished by the organization, I have never known of any harm or evil resulting from it.

Instead of this order having had a tendency to "choke the temperance cause to death" it has kept it alive in thousands of localities where had it not been for this order the cause of temperance would have had no advocates. There are thousands of localities where the "secret temperance order" is the only temperance organization that has ever had an existence. In the city where I now reside, within my recollection various attempts have been made to start open organizations. The Good Templars have always attended the meetings, and have continued to do so until they were about the only ones who did attend, when they have concluded it was not worth while for them to keep up the two organizations.

I belong to the same Good Templars' lodge with which I first united. For nearly thirty years it has kept up its weekly meetings, as regularly as a church keeps up its weekly prayer meeting. More than two thousand persons have taken the pledge of total abstinence at its altar, the large majority of whom have faithfully kept it. From what I know of the character and surroundings of these persons, I am safe in saying that had it not been for the lodge, scores, if not hundreds, of them would have become intemperate, and many of them would have filled drunkards' graves. This lodge has furnished speakers for scores of public temperance meetings that have been held in the various churches in this city, and has paid all the expenses attending these meetings. It has circulated a large amount of temperance literature that has had much to do in creating the sentiment in favor of prohibition that now exists in our city. There are hundreds of other lodges in this State, and thousands in other States, that have done a similar work. The order in this State, besides circulating a large amount of temperance literature, besides the local work done by its hundreds of lodges, has kept constantly in the field during the first ten or fifteen years from two to five able lecturers who have been employed in advocating the principles of total abstinence and prohibition, and in this way has mainly been created that strong public sentiment in favor of prohibition that resulted in polling 13,225 votes for the prohibition party the first time it was fairly in the field in this State. And yet the order is charged with "choking the temperance cause to death."

Look at the other great temperance organizations of the present day: the National Temperance Society and Publication House, which has done and is now doing such a grand work. The idea of this organization was started in the brain of a prominent Good Templar—James Black of Pennsylvania; and Mr. Black had more to do in bringing the organization into existence than any other one man, and to-day the president and at least thirty or forty of the vice-presidents of this organization are members of "secret temperance orders."

Take the National Prohibition party: it earliest members were connected with the order of Good Templars. It may be said to have had its birth in this order, and a large number of its most active workers are to-day members of this order.

In the number of your paper before me there is an article in which twenty-five objections to Freemasonry are given. Admitting that these objections are well founded, not one of them will apply to Good Templary. But one objection can really be made to the order of Good Templars, and that is that it is "secret." Now, Mr. Editor, you know all about this order, and I ask you in all kindness, what does its secrecy amount to? But little more than the secrets of any well-regulated family. There are no oaths to be taken by persons joining this organization. There are some simple forms and ceremonies, entirely innocent in themselves, distasteful it may be to many of us, and yet attractive to many others. These innocent forms and ceremonies, the simple password by which the lodge protects itself from intruders, have a strong influence in keeping the lodge in existence, and thousands of lodges have lived and worked for many years, and accomplished good, while without these things they would not have held together a single year. I have never known any harm to result from this feature of the organization, while I have known it to be the means of accomplishing immense good.

Yours truly, SAMUEL D. HASTINGS.

HOW THE MASONS DIDN'T

LAY THE CORNER STONE OF THE COURT HOUSE IN LENAWEE COUNTY, MICHIGAN.

Seeing in a late number of the Cynosure an account of the laying of the corner-stone of Du Page county, [Knox county is probably meant. ED.] Illinois, I feel moved to tell how the lodge was prevented from airing their profunctory ceremonies in Adrian, Mich., last year.

It had been given out that the Masons were to be invited to lay it, and many Anti-masons feared it might be the case. A vigorous protest was prepared and put in circulation for use in case of necessity, but as it turned out there was no occasion to make use of it. The following article I had clipped from a newspaper sometime previously, and laid it aside in case it might be needed. About the time the invitations to the Masons would be extended it was sent to the Adrian Times, the leading paper in the county, and printed. It ran as follows:

THAT CORNER-STONE.

Apropos of laying the corner-stone of the new court house the following clipped from the Buffalo Telegram is in point, and is respectfully submitted:

"What mechanical or other facilities for laying corner-stones of public monuments does the order of Freemasons enjoy which other societies do not possess? Of what constitutional connection with government, National, State, or Municipal have these fanciful gentlemen, that they come forward on every occasion of the sort to monopolize the ceremony? What national significance was there in their performance of this function at Yorktown, lately? In the abstract, perhaps, corner-stones of whatsoever kind are as well laid with their mummery as with any other mummery, and, indeed, would be as well laid without any mummery at all, by the mechanic and his helper who do the real work. But why should one organization have the monopoly of the business? Is Freemasonry the established religion of the United States? Or are the secrets of it the real esoteric and mysterious abracadabra of American politics? Who or what do they represent? Certainly not the whole people, for a majority of people are not Masons, and millions of people, whose rights and opinions are as sacred as those of their fellow citizens look upon their organization with disfavor.

Why don't the others have a chance to air their good clothes and their profunctory ceremonies now and then in a country where all persons, all sects, all societies and orders are supposed to be free and equal before the law? We haven't the least idea but that the Grand Hoki Poki of the Knights of Pythias or the Supreme Right Worthy High Monkimonk of the Noble Order of Red Men, or the Supreme Right Valiant and Noble Grand Eminent Commander of the Knights of Honor, could handle a trowel on such an occasion with as much mechanical skill, ceremonial unction, and bravery of ribbons and feathers and aprons and gew-gaws, as the Supreme Right Worthy Grand Eminent Whatye-call-'em of the Free and Accepted Masons. Give 'em all a chance."

It fell like a bombshell in the camp of the enemy. Men who were not Masons carried it around the streets to read, and it produced a general laugh at the expense of the fraternity. It provoked discussion, and that of all things Freemasonry hates. They had not discretion enough to conceal their chagrin, but fell into a rage declaring they would have nothing to do with the laying of the corner-stone in any way. This, of course, was what our friends desired, that the order should keep their hands off, as an order, from a building erected for the administration of justice and paid for by the whole people.

However, the people came together on the day appointed in large numbers. An able and appropriate address was delivered by Chief Justice Cooley of the Supreme Court of Michigan, and the corner-stone was as duly and truly laid, and mueh more so, than it could have been by a company of men who are bound together by oaths with death penalties attached to extricate each other from any difficulty in which they may be engaged whether right or wrong.

I was much interested in the article which appeared in a recent number of the Cynosure containing extracts from the reports of the Grand Lodge of Michigan for 1864. I showed the article to a friend who is a high Mason and asked him if he knew any thing about it. He replied he did for he was present at the time. I remarked to him that eternal vigilance seemed to be the price of Masonry as well as of liberty, in view of the facts narrated in the extracts referred to. With a sort of knowing look, he said, "Masons are not so much different from other men."

The thorough exposition of Freemasonry by brethren Ronayne and Stoddard in Adrian, a few years ago, has not been lost work. While the lodge may, and perhaps does, find congenial soil in a certain element in society, it is not popular. Its obligations and horrible penalties do not strike the public mind as being consistent with our American institutions. This is seen in the obligations of the so-called minor secret orders, where a simple form is deemed sufficient. But the light should and must be kept steadily turned on the secret orders, great and small, in order that error may be destroyed and the right prevail. C. QUICK.

"HOW CALLEST THOU ME GOOD."

ALBION, Iowa, Sept. 12, 1885.

EDITORS CYNOSURE:—In reading J. T. Sutor's article, "Have Charity," the same idea occurred to me that always does when I read such articles: I never could understand such reasoning, "That it is not men but the institution that he opposes." Men compose the institution. I cannot see how to oppose an institution and not oppose its members. I have watched the working of Freemasonry for more than forty years. I never have known any good men or man who were adhering Masons. At the death of Morgan all good men left the lodge, and Freemasonry was tried, condemned by public sentiment and abandoned by its votaries, given up as a by-gone, wicked institution for over twelve years. Since then Masonry is made up wholly of bad men. All intelligent men know or may know what Masonry is, and whoever goes up into a lodge and has his clothes taken off except his shirt, blindfolded, with a rope around his neck, and there on his knees with the Bible in his hands repeats, "Furthermore do I promise and swear," and lives under those blasphemous oaths, is not what I call a good man. I care not whether he is a minister or not, there is no excuse for him. In my opinion, Mr. Sutor's article is too mild for the occasion. I was eighteen years old when Morgan was murdered, and, as all men except Masons were then, am a radical Anti-mason.

A SPIRIT-ENLIGHTENED LETTER.

VANGUARD OFFICE, ST. LOUIS, Sept. 8, 1885.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN CYNOSURE:—We have come to know you through the Cynosure, which is regarded by our band as a standard exchange. As we read it our hearts are knit to yours in the one work of striking at the root of so many organized evils which threaten individual and national life and liberty. The Cynosure should have a world-wide circulation. It would be more beneficial in the family than so many tame religious papers. Many good, well-meaning people are ensnared for want of knowledge. For this reason, I believe the fund for the gratuitous distribution of your paper is as necessary as a missionary fund to send men and women to heathen lands. We shall soon be a heathen land and in worse than heathen darkness, having rejected the light of the Bible, unless we destroy these anti-Christian organizations.

The action of the G. A. R. at their late national meeting, regarding observing of Decoration Day on the Sabbath of 1886, should make every lover of God's law or even civil law, spring to his feet in defence of so vital a principle. Our help is in God. Christian people must take action against such an outrageous defiance of law and the consciences of Christian citizens. In the zeal of prohibitionists, this Sabbath principle must not be trampled upon or God will not prosper. Here is the danger, men and women take in so little of the work to be done, see only one of the monster's heads and in their zeal to strike that off give him an opportunity to grow strong in other parts. We need to take in the whole work.

For this reason, the American platform commends itself to every Christian mind, and must ultimately come before the people. The whole truth must be kept before the people. This is indeed a warfare, and "we contend not with flesh and blood." It is sin arrayed against holiness. God's government on earth is defied by the devil. "In the name of the Lord of hosts, the God of the armies of Israel" we must rally our forces and unitedly move to battle under his leadership. "The battle is not ours but the Lord's." Praise the Lord for the privilege of being in the front ranks for the truth. You know it was said of those men and women "who through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises * * out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in fight, turned to flight the armies of the aliens, of whom the world was not worthy," that they without us "should not be made perfect." Praise God. I love, as Whittier says, the "tumult of the truth."

I will add, we aim to make the Vanguard an exponent of all Bible truth and Christian practice. I have had the experience of sanctification for some years. It saves me from all sinful dressing, ennobles my womanhood and helps me to live solely to glorify God. Yours in Christian fellowship,

ANNA ABRAMS.

PITH AND POINT.

A WORD TO BROTHER R. CANNING.

In my article on tobacco I recognized Christians with serious faults, as scores of Scripture texts do. It is needless to quote. See Gal. 3: 1; 1 Cor. 3: 1. If faultless saints call us to an account for "intimating" that believers may possibly stray so far from God as to use tobacco, or even to join the lodge, we must cite them to the very many texts that intimate the same thing, in both Testaments. "Every branch in me that beareth not fruit," etc. John 15: 2. Explain this in harmony with the teaching of the Scriptures and you'll justify my language in said article. This shall not go into a controversy with my consent, on the question whether a Christian can sin and yet be a child of God. Now, dear brother, if you have a penchant to shoot again I'll simply "stand fire.—NATHAN CALLENDER.

THE MORALITY OF THE PHARISEES.

In the paragraph on the "Popular Explanation of the idea of Masonic Paganism," by Elder Browne, (Cynosure of August 27), I read, "The men who treated Christ worst were the most moral men of the day." Then "But Christ said of them (the Pharisees) that they outwardly appear unto men to be righteous, but within are full of dead men's bones and all uncleanness." What! such men the most moral men of their day? What is morality but a conformity to the moral law? But what does the moral law require but a right state of heart? Is not the moral character found alone in the intention? No! The men who treated Christ worst were the most immoral men of their day. As is said immediately before, "the picture is good, but is of the devil." There was no morality about those men. Their character was hypocrisy. The "lecturers" must take care "how they hear" and "what they hear."—A. H. SPRINGSTEIN, Warren, Mich.

NOTE.—The idea of the speaker concerning the morality of the Pharisees was doubtless that in their profession and in the ordinary estimation of the Jews the Pharisee was the most moral man of the time. See the parable of the Pharisee and publican and Christ's injunction to obey them, Matt. 23: 2.

STUDIES IN THE KINGS AND PROPHETS.

LESSON I. Oct. 4, 1885.—Elisha at Dothan.—2 Kings 6: 8-23.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Fear not: for they that be with us are more than they that be with them.—2 Kings 6: 16.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

COMMENTS ON THE LESSON BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. The invisible shield. vs. 8–16. The Syrian king, baffled in all his military plans by the supernatural knowledge of Elisha, turns his mind to getting possession of the prophet's person; and the servant of the man of God, going forth early in the morning, probably on some domestic errand, is paralyzed with fear to see an armed host surrounding the little city of Dothan, whose inhabitants would without doubt surrender up his master to save themselves from massacre. This great host is a picture of what St. Paul calls the principalities and powers of this world—the vast anti-Christian force constantly arrayed against the individual believer, especially those who, like Elisha, are reformers, setting themselves against the evils of their times. The rum traffic is a great host. A business in which nine hundred millions are annually invested must be a mighty foe with which to contend. But the lodge power is in many respects more to be dreaded. It attacks in secret, people have less knowledge of it and consequently care less for the harm it does; but above all, it is "the image of the beast," a universal system of false worship with that malignant spirit of persecution inherent in all false religions. There never was a time when the foes of Christ's cause were so numerous, so powerful or so crafty, But let us not be discouraged. For every chariot of iron which the enemy may bring against us God has a chariot of fire, for every spirit of evil embodied or disembodied, an angel in immortal panoply. The only reason why so many Christians dare not speak, or write, or vote their convictions is because their eyes have never been opened to see that they might have for their defenders all the armies of heaven, if their weak cowardice did not stand in the way.

2. The power of prayer. vs. 17–23. The blindness of the church to great moral and spiritual evils would trouble us less if we would remember this truth:—that saints sometimes need praying for as much as sinners. Ministers need to have their eyes opened not only to the great evils of secrecy, but to God's infinite power to help them in the combat with it. The blindness with which the Syrian host was smitten in answer to Elisha's prayer was a mental hallucination rather than literal blindness. To use the New Testament phrase, "their eyes were holden" that they did not know Elisha or guess that he was leading them the wrong way. So it is often through prayer that confusion enters the counsels of the wicked, and they plan measures which defeat themselves.

LIGHT FROM THE WORD.

What are the Christian's foes? Eph. 6: 12. Do good men need praying for? Luke 22: 32.

"Warred against Israel." The war between the kingdom of Israel and the kingdom of Syria, which had been closed by the battle of Ramoth-Gilead (1 Kings 22: 3) and the death of Ahab (1 Kings 22: 35), was followed by an interval of three or four years of imperfect peace, during which the kings of the two countries were on terms of partial friendship (2 Kings 5: 5); but raids by marauding bands still continued (2 Kings 5: 2). The war now commenced. The first operations, however, were not conducted by large armies. The raids were made on a larger scale, and under the direction of the king of Syria himself. Not meeting with any adequate resistance, the armed parties made incursions into the very heart of the kingdom of Israel, and ventured within a few miles of Samaria, the capital. They were not strong enough, however, to undertake any sieges or engage in any pitched battles. Their object was plunder, and, if possible, to obtain possession by stratagem of the person of the King of Israel.—Todd.

"The king of Israel sent to the place . . . . and saved himself there;" i. e., he took care there. He sent spies to the place in order to ascertain if Elisha had given correct information and wise counsel and he saved himself by observing the counsel of the prophet and not passing through that locality.—Whedom. No one has ever regretted that he followed the divine advice of a man of God; on the contrary, many have thus been saved from ruin.—Lange.

"And one of his servants said." This is supposed by some to have been Naaman, the healed leper, whose marvelous cure had made him regard the prophet as almost omniscient.—Tayler Lewis.

"Elisha . . . telleth . . . the words that thou speakest in thy bed-chamber." Tremble with fear, ye obstinate sinners, because all is bare and discovered before his eyes, and shudder at the thought that the veil behind which ye carry on your works does not exist for him! All which ye plot in your secret corners to-day ye will find to-morrow inscribed upon his book, and however secretly and cunningly ye spin your web, not a single thread of it shall escape his eye!—Krummacher.

"They that be with us are more than they that be with them." We need not suppose that Elisha saw the angelic host of which he here spake: He only gave utterance to the conviction of all God's saints when the world persecutes them (comp. Ps. 34: 7; 55: 18; 91: 11; 2 Chron. 32: 7, etc.). God, they know, is on their side; they need not fear what flesh can do unto them. His angels, an innumerable host, are ever guarding those who love him. —Cook. The prophet speaks not of a casual event, but of something continued and always true in the providence of God.—Lewis.

"Behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire." The mountain was the hill on which Dothan was situated. The Syrian army surrounded the hill at its base, so that escape seemed impossible. But between the surrounding army and the prophet the whole space was filled with these fiery symbols of God's protecting hosts. They encompassed the prophet as a body-guard, and of course protected him from the enemy on every side. So Christ spoke to Peter in his anxiety of twelve legions of angels he could have for a guard. (Matt. 26: 53).

"Elisha prayed unto the Lord." Elisha's act was not merely a piece of good-nature and magnanimity; it was rather a prophetical act, in the strict sense of the words, which had no other aim than to glorify the God of Israel. Not for his own sake did Elisha pray Jehovah to smite the Syrians with blindness, but in order that he might lead them to Samaria. The thanks for their surrender into the hands of the king were due, not to him, but to Jehovah. Jehoram was to learn once more to recognize the faithfulness and might of Jehovah, and to be convinced that there was a prophet in Israel (chap. 5: 8), from the fact that these dangerous enemies were delivered into his hands without a blow. On the other hand, Benhadad and the Syrians were to learn that they could not accomplish anything, with all their cunning plots, against the "prophet that is in Israel" (ver. 12), and much less, against him whose servant and witness this prophet was.—Lange.

"And he smote them with blindness." This is not the usual Hebrew word for "blindness," but is a compound word, a thing not common in Hebrew. One part resembles the ordinary word to blind; the other is from a quite different root, meaning to shine. The resulting idea would be that of coruscation or dazzling; and the whole would denote visual bewilderment, hallucination, rather than total loss of sight. The Syric renders it by a word denoting spectres, swimming vision, full of false images; and this would seem to suit the place exactly.—Tayler Lewis. It would have been a difficult matter for Elisha to have conducted a large force of blind men, with their horses and chariots, by the rough and hilly roads of that country, eleven miles, to Samaria. The blindness was a mental bewilderment which disabled them from recognizing Elisha, or understanding where they were or what they were about, and put them wholly in the prophet's power.—Todd.

A Wonderful Woman, A Wonderful Life, AND A Wonderful Book.

Laura S. Haviland is a quiet, gentle, unassuming Quaker woman, 76 years of age, yet vigorous, who has had a remarkable career of usefulness, and has now given to the world a remarkable history of her "Life Work" as a teacher, at an early day, of the colored refugees in Canada and in Michigan, and in other States, as a traveler down South in the guise of a "berry picker," helping out into freedom many slaves; as a nurse and preacher to the sufferers in hospitals during the war; and with Gov. St. John and Flizabcth Comstock, relieving the destitute and suffering refugees in Kansas, etc.

Her book is neither fiction nor founded on fiction, but is an interesting narration of facts of a most thrilling character, as every one will find and testify who will get and read her book, now on sale at the Cynosure office, 221 W. Madison St., Chicago, Ill. Price, cloth, $1,75; half Russia, $2.25.

AMERICAN PLATFORM.

ADOPTED AT CHICAGO, JUNE 20, 1884.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled condition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clannishness by which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile bands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruption, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; and having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and believing the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, both inevitable and indispensable:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, believing with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; believing in the Christian marriage, and not in Mormonism; believing in the religious democracy of the New Testament, and not in the despotism of the lodge; believing, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, not in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we abhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscience by human laws and penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly believe that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike foes to human liberty and welfare. We further most firmly believe that a government without God has none but lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a mere usurpation, we regard all religions and worships invented by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as mere swindling impositions and cheats. We believe in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly believe that the bravery and blood of our soldiers have bought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will be just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised by the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon be not only echoed by their voices, but sustained by their votes.

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following, as containing a brief synopsis of the principles of our government, by which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.
2. That the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.
3. That God requires, and man needs a Sabbath.
4. We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.
5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.
6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to benefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.
7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punishment of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.
8. We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage.
9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be preserved inviolate, and the same equality should be extended to Indians and Chinamen.
10. That international differences should be settled by arbitration.
11. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.
12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.
13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.
14. That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.
15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

The Christian Cynosure.

EDITORS.

J. BLANCHARD. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1885.

THE NEW PARTY.—Why are Americans, and especially The American, so modest about urging the name "American" for the new party? "Prohibition," "Reform," etc., are not fit names. The reform once accomplished such a name becomes obsolete; as would the name Abolition party after slavery ceased. But American is national and permanent; besides being euphonious and popular. American means Christian, because it was, in 1620, the name of "a Christian commonwealth." It also means anti-secret, because our Constitution excluded "orders," "titles of nobility," etc., all that makes a secret lodge. It means a Sabbath, for the Puritans kept Sabbath in the woods on journeys. It also means prohibition. In the Pequot war there were but two quarts of rum, kept strictly for medicine. "The Know Nothings" knew something, viz., how to choose a popular name; and in several States they swept the old parties like a cyclone. Joseph Cook wishes "success to the principles of the American party." Why shrink from the name?

THE UNITED BRETHREN COMMISSION.

Dr. L. Davis has a long article in the Telescope against the United Brethren Commission, and a reply by the editor. The case, as we understand it, is this: By their constitution the fathers of that church undertook, as they had a right to, to keep themselves utterly clear of secret societies, and so declared that there should be no members of them in their communion. If any joined them, they put themselves, by that act, out of the church. One would think none but scoundrels and caitiffs would join or attempt to remain in such a church in contempt of such a law. However, they did. They did more. Strong with their immense backing they joined, and undertook to control the churches which they debased. They boldly defied the constitution and law, and held a convention at Dayton, under the eaves of the Telescope printing house, in which their leaders declared that the rule excluding secret societies should never be enforced. They were voted down by an immense majority at Lebanon, Pa., some twelve or sixteen years ago, but this made no difference. They did not rely on support in the church, but on lodge-power outside, and on brass and craft inside.

The constitution provides that that instrument "can not be changed" but "by request of two-thirds of the whole society." The proper way to change it therefore, was to submit the question, change or no change, to the conferences. But knowing a change would not be voted by those who do the paying and the praying, the leaders, in the Fostoria General Conference, which could be more easily manipulated by the money power, than could those who pay the money, moved and carried a "Commission of twenty-seven" to revise both creed and discipline, expecting by this extemporized snow-plow, to drive or drag the whole church through the cold draft of the lodge. The Cynosure would not accept or argue such a fraudulent issue. The meaning and intent of the move is to let in or keep in the swarming secret orders. They should be assailed as burglars are, not by argument and law but by discipline.

HON. SAMUEL D. HASTINGS.

We call the special attention of our readers to Mr. Hasting's letter in this number of the Cynosure. The candor and ability with which it is written, and the writer's long and sustained endeavor to use Good Templarism for the glory of God and the good of his fellow-men, entitle him to our gratitude and respect. The leadership of the new party, now struggling into birth and being, must consist of such spirits as Mr. Hastings. Nor is it strange that good men like him should be drawn into lodgery, as the fox draws the hen to his mouth, by biting his tail and whirling round and round, till she becomes giddy with gazing, falls from her high roost, and is taken off to his den.

"Aaron, the saint of the Lord," was a capable man and true patriot. Yet he fell into a fatal false worship, precisely as Mr. Hastings fell into Templarism. It was popular. Aaron saw that the people were "set on mischief," he undertook to utilize the fashionable cattle-worship of Egypt for the true religion; made them a calf, and told them to worship the true God, who had brought them from Egypt, by calf-worship. But the experiment ended in a Good Templars' frolic and an Odd-fellows' dance. This was doubtless "distasteful" to Aaron, as Mr. Hastings admits there are some things in his lodge "distasteful to many of us," though "attractive to others." A priest professor in College Seminaire, Quebec, said to the writer, in view of some distasteful ceremonies, "You and I don't need them, but those people do." Christ gave no such!

It is not pleasant to point out the errors and mistakes of good men; but it is kindness to do so. These are some of Mr. Hastings' mistakes:

1. He says their secrecy "is little more than that of every well regulated family."

But this is a terrible mistake. The Templar promises to conceal, never to "reveal any of the private work of this order," and also that he "will sacredly keep and never improperly reveal" * * * "anything pertaining to this (council) degree." A family which should promise and never reveal "anything pertaining" to it, would be social pirates.

2. Again, Mr. Hastings says: "There are no oaths to be taken by persons joining this organization."

But every one who joins, must say, in the still and solemn night, and surrounded by scenic judicial forms, and confronted by the Chief Templar in full regalia: "I, ———, in a full belief in the existence and power of Almighty God, and in the presence of these witnesses, do solemnly, and understandingly promise that I will not reveal any private work of this order;" and that, "in all things I will yield a cheerful obedience to all the laws, rules and usages of this order." How a gentleman of Mr. Hastings' intelligence, having administered the above thousands of times, can say, "There are no oaths to be taken by persons joining this organization," can only be accounted for by the fact that the lodge-god literally and morally "BLINDS THE MINDS" of those who practice these worships.

3. Again, Mr. Hastings—"I was a thorough Antimason in all my views and feelings." And he goes on to say that he refused for a time to join the Sons of Temperance, but finally joined them at Geneva, Wis., because there was no other temperance organization there, and there was a bitter fight. So Mr. Hastings put on the livery of the lodge, to wit., secrecy, regalia, (i. e., royal ornaments) degrees, titles, etc., etc. Note that he had not repented of his Anti-masonry and the support of the good Gov. Ritner. He joined the secret lodge-system, as Saul joined the priesthood, as a war measure. Saul's excuse for practicing uncommanded worship was precisely the excuse of Mr. Hastings for joining a secret lodge at Geneva: "The Philistines will come now upon me, I forced myself, therefore, and offered the burnt offering." (1 Sam. 13: 9.) Had Mr. Hastings forgotten his Bible? its testimony that uncommanded worship is demon-worship, from Moses to Paul? (Deut. 32: 17; and 1 Cor. 10: 20). He joined a temperance lodge and became "brother" with its members, non-professors, deists, and all! He pronounced a creed at the door which purposely omitted Christ, to take in his enemies. He stood before an altar of Jeroboam, got up for political success. He vowed to conceal he knew not what, and to obey laws and rules which he had never heard read, and to give grips of brotherhood and signs of friendship and fellowship to strangers whose characters he could not know, and the whole sealed by the prayer of a chaplain, who might be an infidel or deist, so far as the rules of the lodge were concerned, for any full member was eligible! No wonder such things were "distasteful" to a Christian like Mr. Hastings. He left his Saviour with his dog and hat in the anté-room or at the door of the lodge; and every thing, the whole make up of the performance was a religious invention, "commandments of men." And though Christ's name was foisted into a few of the prayers inside, Christ said of it, "In vain do ye worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men." How could Mr. Hastings forget that all such things are devil's get-ups? called in the Bible, "abominations," spiritual "whordoms," "nothings," "vanities," etc.?

"But," Mr. Hastings replies, "may not churches and their members become corrupt?" Yes; but a lodge is itself a corruption, a man-invented, got-up religion; and to compare such a thing to a church or family is to insult God who made both. It is to compare an unmarried courtezan to a pure wife; "the great whore that sitteth upon many waters," to the "Bride, the Lamb's wife." No wonder such a thing is "distasteful" to men like Mr. Hastings, Dr. Charles Jewett and John B. Gough. Mr. Gough said to the writer, "They got up a great procession at Baltimore, and fixed me out in the toggery of the Templars. It was, I believe, the only time I ever wore it. As I rode along in the carriage, I looked down on myself and saw what a figure I cut. I stripped that horse-collar off, rammed it under the seat (suiting the action to the word) and have never had one on since." It was "distasteful." So was it to the sainted Dr. Marsh and to Dr. Jewett, whose estimate of the orders may be read in another column.

Now, suppose we are "bigoted," "mistaken," "fanatic." Suppose we have misunderstood our Bibles; and that men may manufacture "altars," "rites," and worships ad libitum, without displeasing God. Why should such "distasteful" things be forced upon such men as Mr. Hastings, Finney, Moody, and Dr. Crosby, who dislike them? Suppose that the gray uniform had been so "attractive" to some Union soldiers that they had insisted on putting it on, and yet would stay in our regiments, and fight on the side of legitimate authority. Why, they would have been cashiered, shot, or drummed out of camp, and served them right. Now look on a procession of Masons and Good Templars side by side, and he must have a practiced eye who can tell which is which; and the "degrees" and "titles" of both are alike "Grand" and "Great Grand." If every Good Templars' lodge on earth were dead to-day, neither St. John, the Prohibition candidate, nor Van Fleet, of the Lever, the National Prohibition organ, would "turn their hand over" to bring them to life. Of this any one may satisfy themselves by asking them. Why then force us to serve God in the livery of the devil; or else split the temperance ranks, or join in a vote for candidates nominated by men who do their temperance planning behind tyled doors where the sons of light cannot enter? Hon. Henry Wilson, forced as was Mr. Hastings to join a secret temperance lodge, told the writer, that he straightway moved to publish their ritual and become an open society. Why not emulate the wisdom of that wise politician and honest man?

The American party was for prohibition before the Prohibition party was born. We have made a steady growth. We voted for St. John, the Prohibition candidate, when we had none of our own, because he was, in sentiment, with us. But we cannot, must not, vote with a party which shuts its secret lodge-doors in our faces; nor ought any American to do so, while he knows that Mason-Prohibitionists are sworn brothers of Mason-distillers, brewers, and saloon keepers. We have ample headquarters paid for in Chicago and in Washington, D. C., sufficient to "sow the United States knee-deep" with prohibition publications. Let there be a national mass convention called in the interest of prohibition, inviting only such as will go for open work. Let us merge the Lever with the American and send Mr. Van Fleet to join Prof. Bailey in Washington, and request Fred. Douglass to stump the United States for us. What says Mr. Hastings to this?

SUPREME LODGE, SUPREME FOLLY.

The general meetings of two secret societies in this city during the past week have given the discerning public some idea of the weakness of human nature for mouthing great titles and parading before men with vaunting but shallow dignities and pomp. When the treaties of our government had opened the ports of China to our trade, our plain and wholesome American taste ridiculed the "supreme" titles used by the Emperor, the "Supreme Son of the Sun." But this folly, which was once among us attributed to pagan ignorance and superstition is now the height of fashion among our little imitations of Masonry.

The "Knights and Ladies of Honor" met in the Leland Hotel, and the programme included "lake excursions, visits to the Exposition, carriage drives to various points of interest, visits to the parks, theatres, panoramas, and receptions to the visitors." If there was any time left, business was in order. The installation of the officers of the "Supreme Lodge" was held in Central Music Hall, and as is always the case when that hall is open to the public, a crowd was out, and the attractions of the occasion were increased by plenty of music. The installation services were not long, nor was there any parade of regalia, a simple badge supplying the place. But all the officers were sworn by oath, asking "God to help me in my supreme pledge of honor," taken with hand and forefinger raised. An able speech was made by the new "Supreme Protector" in which he compared his society to the Saviour of the world who came in the appointed time to help mankind, so this order was raised up to supply a great need and perform a great work in society. His reference to Christ was not so reverent as we have here made it appear. The meeting had no prayer, but a chaplain sat among the officers. The objects of society were not very prominently set forth. Its business is life insurance, but as this is done without the supervision of the State perhaps they preferred to say little on this matter. The sociality of the order was one of its grandest developments and eloquent sentences were wasted in telling how by its magic power strangers are made friends, without any other reason for the relation than membership in this order. Such sociality and friendship needs very much indeed the power of a Supreme lodge and plenty of Supreme officers to make it valuable.

The "United Order of Ancient Templers" is a body with both temperance and life insurance drawing its triumphal chariot. The "ancient"-ness of this body is so great as to overpower the skeptic. Its numbers have been doubled this year by a union of the order of Rechabites, a temperance society with some 4,000 members in the Eastern States. Its "Supreme Temple" meetings are not secret, as the secretary or "Supreme Recorder" informs us, and as an earnest of its temperance principles, Mr. J. B. Hobbs, of this city, the candidate of the American and Prohibition parties for Governor of this State last year, was invited to make a public address. Mr. Hobbs made a very good, business-like address to the "Supreme Temple," which provided him a fine audience of seven Ancient Templars, one reporter, and one representative of the public. His apology for accepting the invitation to speak was that he was always ready to give his testimony in favor of prohibition; which is a good rule, but has its exceptions like every other.

The seven who were taking care of this "Supreme Temple" were men evidently of little education, well pleased to be called "supreme" this or that, plain men of the working class, who might make themselves useful if filled with a Christian zeal in a home or church circle, both in promoting temperance and providing for the poor; but their present effort resembles a school-boy mimicry of the larger orders in which they could never hope to hold high office.

—The Detroit Freemason, from which the Cynosure has quoted several times pointed articles on the religion of the lodge, in turn quotes our note of last week on John A. Logan, without note or comment. Let the work go on.

—Secretary Stoddard was last week attending the Swedish Lutheran conference at Paxton, Ill., and the Illinois Synod of the United Brethren at Gibson, expecting to be able to present the claims of our reform upon the churches in both places. This week he has appointments in Genoa, Ill., for the 22nd and 23rd.

—We regret not to have received earlier a notice of a State Prohibition convention in Iowa, to be held at Cedar Rapids on Wednesday of this week. The convention is to be similar to that held last year, which formed a union of the American and Prohibition electoral ticket, and its purpose to help make the present laws against liquor operative, which is evidently not the purpose of the Republican party as expressed in its platform.

—The Swedish Lutheran pastors are becoming more interested in the work of the N. C. A., and welcome our workers to speak among their people. The General Agent has arrauged for a course of lectures in the church of Pastor H. O. Lindeblad, at Moline, to begin on the 28th inst. This is a large and influential congregation, and the pastor feels the importance of having his people faithfully instructed and thoroughly informed on the secret lodge system.

—Bro. W. B. Stoddard, before he goes to Ohio to begin work for the State Association, is spending a little time in Chicago. His first report will be read with interest elsewhere. Will not all the Cynosure readers in the city assist him by a cheering word if you meet him, and especially give him the names of any who might be benefitted by a conversation, and possibly become active friends of the reform.

drink, hence I felt the way would be all open for us both to talk on prohibition sure. Just as I was opening the subject the same officer came up and said: "You must get a permit to speak here, or I will arrest you." Said I to him, "You then have gone back on your temperance principles?" "No," said he, "it is the order of the mayor." We went to see the mayor, but could not find him. All this time I could hear music in the air. I am about sixty-four years of age. This is the first time in the United States and Canada I was ever stopped speaking for Jesus. That night we went again to the People's meeting-house, the only place in town, I am told that can endure sound doctrine on all these reforms, and, by the way, it is a grand house for reformers to work in, as all know who have seen. Bro. Stoddard in his address was plain and kind, and not severe, as he might have been under the circumstances, and still, on our way home, five of us walking along by father Bissell's light—three men and two ladies—the first any of us knew an egg struck me by the side of my head which most knocked me down, then the eggs came thicker and faster, hitting me many times and Bro. Stoddard, and their rotten contents flying over all, even the ladies! Come to learn the facts, the mayor, they say, is a Mason. It is the opinion of all, I think, we would have had no trouble if we had said nothing on secrecy. If there is anything in the lodge that is working harm in the family, the church and the nation, is it not the duty of all true reformers to expose it as we do the evil of the saloon? If, in our exposing the evils of these oath-bound armies, our liberty or free speech is to be taken away, and on the top of that we are to be pelted with rotten eggs, it is time we understand our business and prepare for action accordingly.

For the encouragement of the true and faithful, in and out of Humboldt, I have this to say, First, one thing is now settled: God ordained that house to be built at Humboldt as a reform temple. The room up stairs will hold beds enough to accommodate all the reform workers that may be needed at any one time, in exposing every evil way and work, the men of God remaining in the temple all night. No danger from eggs! as these secret men (they say) do their work in the night. Hence let all the workers of reform remember this earthly tower of the Lord where the righteous may run in and be safe. The State of Nebraska can thank God for a headquarters of general deliverance.

Second, I have always felt that good eggs were strengthening to me on the inside. I find there is nothing but the grace of God that can excel a plaster of spoilt eggs on the outside, in reform work!

Third, I have been told that in anti-slavery times one bad egg applied to an abolitionist, would hatch out ten young ones! I have come to this conclusion, that our facilities for hatching these bad eggs are better than in days of old. I think I have turned out in about one week ten of the tallest reform chickens, or rather reform workers, of any now in the field. I think I can safely count on one hundred as the product of the Humboldt convention. Hence, the friends at Humboldt can thank God and take courage. If one can accomplish so much, what will be the result of all the faithful workers in that convention?

FROM THE GENERAL AGENT.

CHLOROFORMING THE UNITED BRETHREN.

GIBSON, Ill., Sept. 18, 1885.

The Central United Brethren Conference is in session here, Bishop Castle presiding. Forty-five ministers and twenty-eight lay delegates answered at roll call yesterday afternoon. Reports from different circuits vary somewhat, but on the whole iudicate much work and some success. I had hoped to obtain a hearing on our reform, but after conferring personally with the Bishop and other leading members am going away without speaking. Apparently the policy is to keep this question of secrecy out of the conferences, and avoid any discussion throughout the bounds of the Connection. I am told that the U. B. church is "passing through a crisis," and hence moderation, prudence, and wisdom are required. But these statements are unquestionably true, but whether it is prudent and wise to keep silent or not is the question. The Publishing House and funds at Dayton and the church organ are directed and used by those who favor the "commission" and proposed "change", and furnish a ready means for reaching the membership; while those opposing the "commission" and proposed "change" are greatly restricted in means and agencies for reaching the membership in the churches. If the consideration of this question can be kept out of the annual conferences as now seems probable, the Telescope will have a whole year in which to manufacture a sentiment favorable to its own views and wishes in the matter. I do not say that the management of the publishing interests of the church would take advantage of their opportunity, but they certainly have the opportunity if disposed to use it, and ordinary men would be strongly tempted to make use of means so potent and easily controlled. Bros. Hoobler, Kretsinger and the veterans say the "Central Conference is loyal to the backbone," and will never yield its position on the secrecy question, and some favor the discussion in the conference, while the prevailing sentiment seems to be "keep this vexed question out of conference if possible." Bishop Weaver is reported to me as having said, "Nine-tenths of the U. B. ministers and members are in favor of the law on secrecy as it stands." The senior bishop ought to know; and if he is even approximately correct, why should the majority concede to so small a minority the right to ignore this question or pass it silently by in their deliberative bodies, especially when these annual gatherings furnish the best if not about the only opportunity for a free, full and personal expression of views. I speak as an "outsider," but not as a disinterested party, for I have met so many of these good "Brethren" in their homes, on their circuits and in legislative and deliberative bodies, that my sympathies have been warmly enlisted and my attachments have become very strong; but while endeavoring to be impartial in judgment, I must say that this silent policy is a mistake, or I am greatly in error as to what will be the outcome. Truth has no occasion to shun discussion. It is the "politic," the "scheming," the "artful," that seeks refuge in the cry "Let us alone!"

Enquiring of a brother about the condition of his work this morning, he said, "The church in Decatur ought to be called the United Sisters in Christ, for the men are all in the lodges and seldom come to meeting." Another brother standing by remarked, "My folks are all Methodist, but I left that church because I would not fellowship the lodge, and now it seems as if the U. B. church was going to leave me to stand alone, but I will never compromise on this question."

Father Kretsinger preached to a crowded house last evening, taking for his text the 23rd Psalm. The sermon, like the man, was brimful of piety and practical common sense. Father Kretsinger has read the Cynosure too long and carefully not to be sound on the lodge question. I have met here a daughter of the late Bishop Edwards who strongly resembles her father, and tells me she has inherited all his principles on radical reforms. She is very active and is here, as I understand, in the work of the Woman's Mission. Women with such principles are needed as leaders in the aggressive work of the U. B. church.

PROVIDENTIAL.

The freight train on which I expected to reach Paxton was detained, and after waiting some time at the depot I returned to the conference room. The "Ghost of Banquo" was up and the feeling was intense over the following resolution: "Resolved, That it is the sense of this conference that our members should not join the G. A. R. or any secret society." The ayes and nays were called for and the Bishop submitted the question of taking such a vote to the conference. He made a few remarks and the secretary called the roll; 22 voting aye, and 30 nay. Rev. H. Stoddard, of Summerfield, explained his position as a born anti-secretist and loyal to the U. B. church, but he could take an Odd-fellow in one hand and a G. A. R. in the other and go to the communion, glorifying God; but he did not wish to vote and so was passed by.

A DIFFERENT ATMOSPHERE.

PAXTON, Sept. 19 A. M.—The spacious auditorium of the Swedish church was well filled yesterday while I spoke 45 minutes, the time allotted to me before the conference. Close attention was given and, as far as I can judge good was done.

A leading member of the conference remarked, when I was speaking of the Cynosure and the National Conference of churches, "We go slow on such things," which is true; but this I notice—they go, and not backwards, on reform questions. There was a good interest apparent immediately after my lecture yesterday, but on visiting the conference this morning, after the brethren had thought and consulted and prayed over it, I found it had increased seven-fold at least. I arranged for a course of lectures at Moline, Ill., beginning on Monday, the 28th inst., and could have made appointments for one or two months ahead, if I had been at liberty to do so. I had hoped to find a suitable place for holding our State meeting while at the U. B. Conference, but as I am disappointed in this and see nothing more that I can do here, I have decided to make an inspection of the field at Hoopeston and vicinity where I intend spending Sabbath.

The Swedish Lutheran church here is numerically the largest in the place. It has a membership of 440, and a Sabbath-school of 130. Their property held for church purposes is estimated at $15,000 and is kept in the most tasteful order. The audience room has a seating capacity of 1,000, and is furnished with a $1,200 organ. They pay their pastor $1,000, besides the use of a comfortable parsonage. They are a people of small means, but very industrious habits, and have attained to their present condition of competency by economy and application to business. Not a secretist of any order is allowed in their communion, and as the people become informed they are destined to be a power against the lodge in this city. The pastor has very kindly offered his church to me for a course of lectures and promises a collection at the meetings in aid of our work. I purpose to accept the invitation, and give the lectures at as early a day as possible.

J. P. STODDARD.

THE HOME.

BEAUTIFUL WORDS.

"Cast thy bread upon the waters; for thou shalt find it after many days."—Eccl. 11: 1.

'Mid the losses and the gains;
'Mid the pleasures and the pains,
'Mid the hopings and the fears,
And the restlessness of years.
We repeat this passage o'er—
We believe it more and more—
Bread upon the waters cast
Shall be gathered at the last.

Gold and silver, like the sands,
Will keep slipping through our hands;
Jewels, gleaming like a spark,
Will be hidden in the dark;
Sun and moon and stars will pale,
But these words will never fail:
Bread upon the waters cast
Shall be gathered at the last.

Soon like dust, to you and me,
Will our earthly treasure be;
But the loving words and deeds
To a soul in bitterest need,
They will not forgotten be,
They will live eternally—
Bread upon the waters cast
Shall be gathered at the last.

Fast the moments slip away,
Soon our mortal powers decay,
Low and lower sinks the sun,
What we do must soon be done;
Then what rapture, if we hear
Thousand voices ringing clear—
Bread upon the waters cast
Shall be gathered at the last.

A HIGHER TYPE OF PIETY THE GREAT NEED OF OUR DAY.

[A paper read before the Ministerial Union of Philadelphia, 1884, by Rev. Arthur T. Pierson, D. D, and published by their unanimous request.]

The first fifteen centuries of Christian history may be described by three words, formation, deformation, reformation. The deformation covers a thousand years, marked by putrefaction and petrifaction, or the loss of godly savor and sensibility. Heresy and iniquity; a papal system more disastrous than paganism; ignorance, superstition and practical idolatry: these are a few of the shadows that overhung the church till Protestantism was born. To-day, so prevalent are irreligion and infidelity, so subtle is the charm of a worldly religiousness, that only evangelistic activity keeps the church evangelical.

Our church-life is undermined by worldliness. No line of separation from the world exists, except in the fact of church-membership. Our Lord bids us "keep ourselves unspotted from the world," and "hate even the garment spotted with the flesh," because in close contact, not to say conformity, there is contagion: a worldly spirit, caught by the church, infects and infests her whole life, and is fatal to spiritual power.

Not conformed but transformed, are the conditions of true life and power. In how many disciples do we find them? Thousands, like Ananias, defraud the Lord of his dues; like Simon the Sorcerer, estimate spiritual gifts on a money basis; like Demas, forsake Christ for this present world, or, like Diotrephes, love pre-eminence. Our Lord, even at a marriage festival, did not lose his character as the Son of God, but manifested forth his glory and won disciples to believe. Church members drop their character, as Christians, at the door of the gaieties of the world, as an Oriental guest shuffles off his sandals, and so mingle indiscriminately with the devotees of fashion and frivolity!

The god of this world encloses our feet in his most ingenious snare, when he secures from the Lord's disciples the recognition of his favorite beguilements. Certain institutions have always been used by Satan to ruin souls, such as the theatre, opera, card-table, horse-race, and dance. The theatre appeals, in a pure-minded man, to a normal, histrionic appetite; but as an institution, caters to our lower propensities, and cannot be sustained without ministering to vice. Booth himself sank $150,000 in New York City, in trying to establish a dramatic school for good morals! The theatre shows itself a putrid carcass by the drinking saloon, gambling saloon and brothel, the vultures that gather round it. A game of cards may be innocent, but, for centuries, has been filthy with the defiling touch of gamblers and pickpockets. The horse-race may attract as an exhibition of the beauty and speed of the noblest of animals; but, as an institution, it is an open door to hell. The dance may be conducted by innocent maids and stainless men, but, as it exists in society, it deserves to be branded as "lascivious."

Separation from the world there must be. The Roman soldiers, after a night's revel, at day-dawn put on the soldier's armor and became sober; so from the moment of conversion, the course of this world is to be put away as among the works of darkness, and the armor of light to be put on, never to be taken off. Like Daniel in Babylon, we are to present a perpetual contrast to our surroundings, and be so isolated and insulated spiritually, to be filled and charged with the life of God. The New Testament puts the heaviest stress upon an unworldly life. Yet in the church are a few decided lovers of God, thousands of decided lovers of the world, and thousands more trying to compromise between two principles and courses of life, as utterly at war as light and darkness. The bulk are not consecrated; they belong to the "worldly holy" or the "wholly worldly." Out of the normal Christians there may be "ten millions" who give evidence of regeneration! With millions more, there is a vain dependence upon a dead faith, or dead works, or connection with a state church, instead of the righteousness wrought in them by the Spirit.

Dr. Rice of Virginia, remarked that foreign missions will not advance to any great degree till there is a higher type of piety at home; it would not consist with the divine plan, to diffuse widely such a type of piety. In fact, such piety has but little disposition to diffuse itself; it requires all its vitality and energy to maintain its present position; there is none to spare!

"Four-fifths of the nominal membership of our churches add nothing to their real power; they are a dead weight or a positive hindrance to the advance of the Gospel; they fill up the gulf between the church and the world, and break down the distinction between the truly regenerate and the enemies of God and the truth." How can we expect God to permit rapid diffusion of a low grade of religious life! He rather selects the advance guard of Christians, to carry the cross into the enemies' country, and permits difficulties and dangers to face them, that turn back all but heroic souls. Hence, the type of piety found in missionary churches is in advance of that at home. In proportion to laborers and means employed, the results are three-fold as great as at home! Within eighteen months, 100,000 in India alone became identified with Christian communities; but we have to go into the heart of pagandom where a few Christians, imbued with special consecration, are laboring, to find such results. In the very garden of the Lord, where they are to be expected, no such harvests wave! In the race for worldly treasure and pleasure; in the worship of mammon; in the loss of a vivid sense of the reality and verity of spiritual things; in the lack of power to prevail in prayer; in the absence of that grand concurrent witness of an unworldly life, more weighty than any testimony of the lips; we also lose all true power to go forth conquering and to conquer!

One startling fact of our church life is the absence of personal service in saving souls. Service seems lost sight of in salvation, which is itself sought with but feeble and spasmodic effort. I have been wont to urge upon disciples a systematic seeking of souls, putting the question pointedly, "Do you know that you have ever been instrumental in leading one soul to Christ?" only to be met in hundreds of cases with the sad confession that there has been no effort put forth in that direction.

One array of figures has often overwhelmed me. A simple calculation will show how rapid would be the conquest of the whole world for Christ, on the basis of one new convert, every year, as the fruit of the labors and prayers of every disciple. Upon this basis, if the true followers of the Lord now number only 30,000,000, the number of disciples in seven years would be 1,920,000,000. Our supposition allows to each child of God an entire year for the winning of each new convert; and yet within seven years we overtake the entire population of the globe. Take a more astounding proposition. Suppose but one truly godly man were now upon earth. Let him, during this year, convert one other, etc.; at this simple rate of geometrical progression, doubling the number every year, in thirty years the number of converts would be over one thousand millions. And yet, after 1800 years, the proportion of disciples to the present multitude of mankind is probably no larger than when Constantine ascended the throne.

Where are the marks of consecrated capital, of property acquired and administered by disciples as stewards of God?

In the light of the New Testament, the question may be raised whether it is right for a disciple to be rich. Paul and James warn not only against dishonest gains and selfish or sensual indulgences, but against the lust of accumulation; the curse of canker and rust which gathers about hoarded treasure. Moses turned his back upon the three lusts, ambition, appetite, and avarice, when, in one heroic resolve, he forsook the court of Pharoah, the pleasures of sin and the treasures of Egypt. During Old Testament times the doors of the Gospel had not been thrown open to the whole world, and the avenues for the use of money, in works of charity and mercy, were comparatively few and narrow. But now, with a thousand millions crying for the light of God, how can they who love Christ hoard wealth? Which ever way we look, the pleading hand of God confronts us, in the thousand demands for temporal and spiritual relief, ready to use every spare dime of the Christian world. How can disciples grow rich but by shutting their eyes and ears? I know one Christian man who spent for his own house, grounds, furniture, and ornamentation, five times as much as the American Board, in all its missionary operations for a year. In homes of disciples the value of pictures, statues, silver plate, etc., more than exceeds all that the churches jointly give to spread the Gospel among the unsaved.

TWO WAYS—WHICH?

One evening, in a parlor of a summer watering place, the young people were dancing. One lady was not taking part in the exercise. "Does not your daughter dance?" asked another lady of this young lady's mother. "No," was the reply. "Why, how will she get on in the world?" "I am not bringing her up for the world," was the quiet answer. The young lady is now a woman, and the influence of her consecrated life is felt in many of the Christian interests of a great city. But for what are you bringing up your daughters, dear mothers of other young girls? What aim have you for them? Are you bringing them up for the Lord or for the world? What are your dreams and ambitions for them? What do you want to see them become? Do you want them to shine in society, to "marry well," to live in wealth? Is that the vision that fills your soul when you think of them? Look on a little farther. Life is short. Suppose your dream is fulfilled—is it anything more than a dream? What lies beyond? The curtain is drawn, and there is the hushed chamber of death. What do you want for your child then? The curtain is drawn again, and eternity opens. What would your fond affection choose for her then? It is better to think matters of this kind through to the end.—Selected.

A BOY OF YE OLDEN TIME.

I have heard of a boy who lived long ago—
For such boys are not found nowadays, you know—
Whose friends were as troubled as they could be
Because of a hole in his memory.

A charge from his mother went in one day,
And the boy said "Yes," and hurried away.
But he met a man with a musical top
And his mother's words through that hole did drop.

A lesson went in; but, ah, me! ah, me!
For a boy with a hole in his memory!
When he arose to recite he was all in doubt;
Every word of that lesson had fallen out.

And at last, at last—oh, terrible lot!
He could speak but the two words, "I forgot!"
Would it not be sad, indeed, to be
A boy with a hole in his memory? —Sel.

THE USES OF INSECTS IN GOD'S WONDERFUL CREATION.

We often talk about the plague of insects. They are often great plagues, but we must not forget that we owe insects a debt of gratitude as well. Only a very small portion of the insect world are noxious; the others are engaged in good work for us—some engaged in warring against the same insect foes that we war against, and the others in clearing away dead and injurious matters. On this last head, an English scientific paper well says:

"Insects are useful in destroying dead vegetable substances, which are even more pernicious to man than animals in the same condition; and not only the soft and succulent portions, but even the solid wood is destroyed by them. In the immense forests of the tropics, the ground would be covered and new shoots be choked up by the ruins of trees which had fallen by accident or age, and which it would require ages to disperse without the aid of insects. But no sooner is a tree fallen than one tribe of animals cuts its bark to pieces, another bores holes in it in all directions; so that the moisture from dew or rain may stand, decompose, and soften. Others come in to eat off the parts that are softened, and so on till it is entirely broken up and scattered; and this is done with such expedition that they will in a few weeks destroy and carry away the trunks of large trees without leaving a particle behind; and in places where, two or three years before, there was a populous town, if the inhabitants, as is frequently the case, have chosen to abandon it, there will be a very thick wood, and not a vestige of a post to be seen."—Selected.

STORY FOR LITTLE FOLKS.

Mamma was having her afternoon chat with the little ones, and each one was telling what they were going to be when they grew up. Charley said he "was going to be a farmer, and have fine horses and cattle, and a plow that he could ride."

John would be a lawyer. He "didn't want the sweat to be running down his back, and the dirt to be getting into his boots;" he would have "nice rooms, and sit in the shade."

"Well, May?" said mamma; as the sweet blue eyes sought hers. "I will be a teacher, mamma, and I won't never, never pull little girls' ears, and I'll help them to get the multiplication table, and let them make pictures on their slates."

"And what will Bertie be?" said mamma. Now Bertie was the four-year-old boy, and that very morning he had walked down town with papa, and stood awhile in front of the blacksmith's shop. He had seen the flaming forge, and the big bellows, and the red-hot iron beat into many shapes. So, walking up to his mother, and looking rather down on the farmer, the lawyer, and the school-teacher, he said, "I'se agoing to be a blacksmif shop."—N. Y. Observer.

TEMPERANCE.

VICTIMS OF INTEMPERANCE.

HOW NATIONS AS WELL AS INDIVIDUALS HAVE BEEN DESTROYED.

The history of the numerous victims of intemperance, or for that matter intemperance itself, is the most melancholy of all histories, and also one of the most important, involving as it does, not only individual successes and failures, but the successes and failures of nations as well. Every page is charged with warning; every chapter reveals the folly of the world and the world's great men and rulers, and proves it true that the "wine and wassail have taken more strong places than gun or steel." Intemperance is habit and nothing but habit, and a habit, too, against which nature seriously revolts at first, but to which she in the course of time and opposition submits, and of which she finally becomes fond. It is only by this force of habit that the taste of wine, of opium, of snuff, and of tobacco, becomes pleasant, for these are not among the real wants of nature, but are purely artificial.

Habitual and long continued use of intoxicating drinks gains an irresistible influence over both the mental and physical powers. The moral qualities become weak or blunted, the mind languid and all the physical constitution changed and impaired, and instead of the harmony that nature intended to have with man there is continual strife with the tyrannical fiend, appetite, for says he who knew man passing well:

> "Boundless intemperance
> In nature is a tyranny; it hath been
> The untimely ending of the happy throne
> And fall of many kings."

Notwithstanding the well-known evil effects of indulgence in the use of inebriating drinks, the habit is one of the most enslaving, exercising a peculiar fascination over the mind, against which the keenest consciousness of the wrong and of the temporal and spiritual consequeness have not the slightest influence. Most of us believe that any habit can be conquered, but there are instances which overthrow any such theory; instances where loss of character, friends and wealth, and the greatest physical and mental anguish count as nothing, if only wine may be had. Dr. Cheyne, a celebrated physician of Dublin, tells a story of a man of his acquaintance, cultivated, popular and wealthy, who had contracted the habit of intemperance. Every effort was made to reclaim him in vain. His friends implored him to abandon the vice, and regain his moral influence and his health. In answer to them he finally said: "I am convinced that all you say is only too true, but I cannot resist. If a bottle of brandy stood at one hand, and the pit of hell yawned at the other, and I knew that if I took but a swallow of the brandy I should be pushed in, I should drink it. You are all very kind. I should be grateful for so many kind, good friends, but you may spare yourselves the trouble of trying to reform me—the thing is impossible."

Dionysius, the younger, is another instance of this infatuation. Aristotle says he would be for ninety days at a time in a state of intoxication, and the frequent recurrence of the habit deprived him in time of his eyesight. The Emperor Zeno was in the habit of drinking himself into an insensible condition, and when in that condition one day his Queen, Ariadne, had him taken to a tomb, the horrors of which he fully realized, when after some hours his senses returned to him. But his pleadings and cries were not heeded. He died an agonizing death, hated by his wife and his people. He was indeed a victim of intemperance. Winceslaus, King of Bohemia, when he went to Rheims in order to treat with Charles VI. on some important national questions, was so under the influence of the wines of that country that he made concessions alike disastrous to himself and his kingdom. A certain monarch of Africa resigned all right to the throne, rather than leave the Portugues colonies where the wines were so pleasant to him, and his opportunities to drink so favorable. Queen Elizabeth's celebrated opponent, Thane O'Neil, always kept at least two hundred tons of wine in his cellar at Dundrum, and he drank of it so immoderately that his servants were obliged to bury him chin deep in the ground in order to allay the strange inflammatory effect his excess had upon him.

Babylon was the mightiest nation on earth until she became a slave to luxury and dissipation. Her active and warlike habits were laid aside for those of sensual indulgence, and soon her name had become a reproach. Said Jeremiah: "The mighty men of Babylon have forborne to fight, they remained in their holds; their might hath failed; they became as women."

Cyrus was the avenging Nemesis for outraged nature. Whilst Belshazzar was engaged in one of his luxurious feasts, Cyrus, whose plans were made in the knowledge of Belshazzar's habits, entered the city, surprised the people, and slew the King and his companions, and the great empire of Babylon passed into his possession. Cyrus was the founder of the Medo-Persian Empire. At first he possessed a country containing only 100,000 inhabitants, but by his temperate and warlike habits he soon made it almost boundless in extent and unrivalled in power. But his victories in their turn introduced to his people the same habit of luxury and sensuality that had made many other nations fall so easy a prey to his courage and military tactics. Luxurious habits are necessarily the bane to national prosperity, and after the union of the Medes and Persians, and the fall of Babylon and its possession by Cyrus, corruption seized upon the Persians. They became intemperate and effeminate, and when the Macedonian king marched against them, they fell, as did Babylon.

The Macedonians were warlike, and under Philip and Alexander, successful in all their enterprises. Alexander is esteemed a greater man and general than Philip, but Philip was what would be called in this age a shrewd politician, and with his superior executive ability, superior discipline, and wonderful command over men, he might have excelled his son in greatness but for the habit of intemperance. Philip finally fell by the hand of an assassin, the victim, although indirectly, of intemperance. Alexander, justly called "the great," early fell a victim to his love for drink. In the beginning of his remarkable career he was temperate in all his habits. Once when the Queen of Caria sent him some choice and sumptuous dishes of food, and some of her best cooks and bakers, he said: "I do not need them; I am supplied with better cooks by Leonidas—a march before day to dress my dinner, and a light dinner to prepare my supper." Plutarch defends him against the charge of excessive drinking. He says he was not so much given to it as was said; that, although he sat long at the table, it was more to talk than to drink. "Every cup contained some long discourse," and he cites as an instance of his contempt for luxury and luxurious habits his surprise when, after he had conquered Darius, he examined the tent Darius occupied, and said, "I am surprised that such effeminacy should occupy the attention of a king." Had Persian luxury never corrupted Alexander he would have remained unequaled in all the attributes that make a man great. Later on Plutarch admits that he became greatly dissipated. His entrance into Carmenia was a mere bacchanalian celebration. His visit to Persia and his conduct near the tomb of Cyrus disclose one of the most degrading scenes in his life. He offered valuable prizes to those who drank to excess, and one man named Promachus, the winner of the chief prize, drank four congii (fourteen quarts, English measure) of pure unmixed wine, dying from the effects in three days after. Thirty men in their efforts to win prizes died on the spot, and soon after six more fell victims to drink. Plutarch, on the authority of Charos, says that forty-one persons died from excessive drink and the severely cold weather.

Alexander's habits caused his death. At a wild carousal, gotten up by Medias, he drank all day and night, consuming fourteen quarts of wine, in drinking to the health of Proteas. This brought on a fever from which he died. Seneca says of him: "This hero, invincible by all the toils of prodigious marches, by all the dangers of sieges and combats, by the most violent extremes of heat and cold, lies conquered by his intemperance."

The Thracians and Scythians were notorious for their intemperance. Both, but more especially the Scythians, were celebrated for moderation and strength in the early part of their history, but in the latter part they were known as "hard drinkers." After Cleomenes, Prince of Sparta, visited the Scythians, his countrymen said that his communication with the Scythians had made him a drinker of wine, and the wine had made him mad. "When persons wished to drink to excess," said Herodotus, "they said 'Let us drink like Scythians.'" Both Thracians and Scythians considered themselves happy only when filled with unmixed wine, and they even poured it upon their garments. The "Thracian way" of drinking and the "Scythian way" of acting are simply to drink quantities of pure wine, and act like a maniac or a fool.

The history of the Thracians contains the story of the vile treachery of Rhescuporis, and his murder of his nephew Cotys, who assuredly fell a victim to the "Thracian way of drinking," and to the "Scythian way of acting."

The history of the Gauls is full of instances of the effects of indulgence in strong drink. Under Brennus the Gauls invaded the Roman Empire and took the Capital, but they drank so freely of wine that they lost their precaution, and Camillus, the Roman hero, living in retirement at Ardea, resolved to save his city, and knowing their condition, surprised them and put them to flight.

Germanicus won his victories over the Marsi—a German people—because of their intemperance. Of the Germans Tacitus says: "Indulge their love of liquor to the excess they require, and you need not employ the terror of your arms; their own will subdue them." Their customs were similar to those of the Persians. Travelers at various times have noticed the habits of drinking in Germany, and the Duke of Rohan says that they seem to have discovered perpetual motion in the use of the wine-cup.

Not an ancient nation can be mentioned that was not the victim of intemperance. The Carthagenians, the Lydians, the Byzantines, the Parthians, the people of Tarentum, the Babylonians and Assyrians, the Medes and Persians, the Greeks and Romans, all drank to excess and fell victims to their own vices.

The ancient Britons, a race of savages, are supposed to have been frugal and temperate, but from using the dress and language of the Romans, they, by degrees, imitated and adopted the vices and luxuries. By the time of the Norman conquest they had become so corrupt that soon the vigorous and warlike Normans fell under the spell and adopted the habits one by one.

As to the effects of intemperance on the moral and intellectual powers history is voluminous, and furnishes numerous examples. In ancient times Cambyses; Philopater, fourth King of Egypt, called Zapcur, because of his extravagance and debauchery; Prusia, king of Bythnia (149 B. C.); Tiberius, derisively nicknamed Biberius; Nero Claudius; Sylla, tyrannical and ambitious; Maximinus, ferocious and pitiless, and indeed nearly all rulers of the Old World, way into modern times, until the Reformation, prove beyond doubt the brutalizing effect of immoderate drink on the feelings and its destruction of all natural feeling.

While admitting that wines are only injurious in the abuse, not in the right use of them, it is none the less true that the misery of every city is proportionate to the number of saloons. The French boast of the few instances in their country of drunkenness, and yet "they drink regularly." If it is true it must be because they, better than any others, know how to manage and conceal vices, since all history proves that in a national point of view, in the effect on mind and morals, on religion and the physical condition of man, intemperance has most unfailing and disastrous effect. In this age when civilization has so far advanced, that satiated men are unceasingly seeking for variety and excitement, we can only look with horror upon the adoption of so many luxurious habits and wonder if the history of intemperance, like all other history, will repeat itself.—Cleveland Leader.

LITERATURE.

ALDEN'S CYCLOPEDIA OF UNIVERSAL LITERATURE, presenting biographical and critical notices, and specimens from the writings of eminent authors of all ages and all nations. Vol. 1. Abbot to Arnold. 475 pp. Price 60c. John B. Alden, New York.

The celebrated and justly popular work of Chamber's which the same publisher made so accessible to book-buyers of moderate means, is one of the best works of its kind. But it is not altogether perfect, since it is a cyclopedia of the English language only, is arranged in periods and according to the character of the writing. This handsome volume introduces a work based on another plan. The alphabetical arrangement has been adopted, thus facilitating reference, and the literature of every age and nation which has been translated into the English language finds its place. The literature of America has never, it is believed, been so carefully and fully presented as it promised in this work. It is, to be sure, hardly possible that numerous minor writers whose names simply are mentioned in other compilations will receive the notice of a biographical sketch with selections from their writings, but there is great promise of fairness and justice to literature in this volume, no matter how unknown or unbefriended the author. For convenience of reference this work will surpass, and its fine type and easily read pages will attract many who open for curiosity merely, to become readers well repaid for a study of its pages. This work is issued also in parts at 15 cts. each, but none who see this handsome first volume will fail to prefer it as really cheaper.

The October number of the North American Review contains twenty-three articles by as many different contributors—among whom are an English Cardinal, an American Admiral, two American Major-Generals, two American ex-Ministers to European courts, an American Artist, a New York Assemblyman, an ex-United State Senator, the Mayor of New York, an ex Governor of New York, and two distinguished American Men of Letters, a famous American Financier. Cardinal Manning on "Inhuman Crimes in Ireland," William W. Astor on "America and the Vatican," Fitz John Porter on "How to Quell Mobs," and a symposium on "The President's Policy" will be the articles most read on account of their timeliness. While "Abraham Lincoln in Illinois" by Hon. E. B. Washburne, and "Vice Presidential Politics in 1864" by Benjamin F. Butler, will be read for their historical value.

Mr. George W. Cable, whose articles in defense of the civil rights of the colored race are a remarkable contribution to our political literature, will contribute to the Century a series of papers on Creole slave-songs and song-dances, including the songs of the Voudous (dealing with the rites of negro serpent-worship), etc., which Mr. D. W. Kembel will illustrate. Gen. Grant's third paper in the Century war series, a description of the battle of Chattanooga, will appear in November. The Wilderness article will be printed in one of the winter numbers.

Vick's Magazine for September is tinted with the beauties of the waning summer and enriched with the fruits of generous autumn. Nothing that can be said for the development of garden fruits and vegetables, or the adornment of house and grounds by flower or shrub or vine is foreign to its columns.

—Since the middle of June a stringent Sunday law has been in force in Austro-Hungary, and the good results are already seen. The law forbids all but necessary work on the Lord's Day, and, since its enforcement, the churches have all been better attended, and the day generally observed as a day of rest. The Monday edition of the Vienna papers are now no longer published, as the work on these was formerly done on Sunday.

—Remarkable revivals are reported among the Huguenot settlements in the south of France. Whole villages are coming to the Lord. It is another Pentecost, and spreads as by a powder train from church to church. God is bestowing on these ancient people, who have so long held up the banner of the true faith amid many perils, a sudden and overwhelming blessing. Nothing like it has been known in modern times. The days crowded with meetings, thirst for the truth, lips open, hearts full; a great spirit of faith and prayer, repentance with tears, family quarrels reconciled, and the unregenerated startled by what they witness of the power of God!—Homiletic Review.

—The secretary of the English Baptist Missionary Society has presented to the king of Belgium, an address, beautifully illuminated on vellum, enclosed in a fitting casket, congratulating him on the great work he has accomplished for humanity and civilization in the creation of the Congo Free State, and in his aid to their missions.

THE CHURCHES.

—Rev. A. M. Milligan, son of the late Dr. Milligan, of Pittsburg, Pa., has been preaching for a short time in Hopkinton, Iowa. On his return home he spent Sabbath, the 13th inst., in Wheaton, preaching an able discourse in the College chapel, and addressing a Sabbath-school convention Saturday evening.

—Bro. C. R. Hunt attended the late meeting of the Indiana Wesleyan conference, and reports that delegates were elected to attend the proposed National Convention of Churches.

—Since the first of last January nearly six hundred persons have been received by the Bethany Presbyterian church, Philadelphia, Rev. A. T. Pierson, pastor.

—Rev. John G. Brown, D. D., has resigned the office of secretary of the United Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, and Rev. William S. Owens, of Steubenville, Ohio, has been elected in his place. He will retain his pastoral charge.

—When the American Board commenced its mission work among the Dakota Indians they only numbered 25,000; now there are over 40,000. Then they were degraded heathen, without a written language, which the missionaries gave them. Last year 117 new members were received into their churches.

—There are 20,602 elders in the Presbyterian church, an increase of 4,101 since the first report in 1881. The churches of this denomination gave last year to all objects $10,192,053. This is an average of over $15 to a communicant. But of the whole sum given $7,541,017 went to congregational expenses, and only $1,772,081 to the boards of the church, while $823,755 went to miscellaneous objects and $55,200 to pay the expenses of the General Assembly.

—It is reported of Dr. George P. Hays' church in Denver that it has 560 members, 9 elders, 9 deacons, and 24 deaconesses, elected by the church. Thus there are 42 persons officially called to the exercise of special watch-care over the church. No one having over 18 persons to look after, and many of these often being members of one family; the work of looking after all is practicable, and not burdensome. These helpers report from time to time to the pastor all cases needing his attention. Thus the pastor's work is simplified, his burdens are lightened, the whole energy of the church is brought into systematic action, the pastor is encouraged, and at the same time stimulated to a more prompt attention to all the details of his office, and none are left to suffer or complain of non-attention.

The Reunion Presbyterian church, of Chicago, began to commemorate the centennial anniversary of the beginning of the temperance reform Sabbath morning with a sermon by its pastor, the Rev. Wm. R. Scott, upon the subject of "The Progressive Decay of the Liquor Traffic versus the Opinion of Demagogues and Political Trieksters."

—Rev. A. W. Mann, the deaf-mute missionary of the Episcopal Church, travels annually 40,000 miles. He ministers to no less than 3,000 of his afflicted brethren, scattered over thirteen dioceses.

—At Northfield Mr. Moody has been buying big wagons to be used on Sundays for carrying to and from church people who live at a distance and could not otherwise attend.

—In response to a petition signed by 1,000 people, the New London (Conn.) ministers and church-members have invited Messrs. Moody and Sankey to hold a series of meetings there.

—There has been a great work of grace going on for a few months in the Congregational church of Peoria, Ill., of which Rev. E. Frank Horne is pastor. The result so far is the addition of 150 members since January 1st.

—Mr. J. E. K. Studd, the English evangelist, is occupying the pulpit of Mr. Moody's church at Chicago. Mr. Studd has been working for several years with Mr. Moody in England. He is a most earnest speaker, energetic and effective. Mr. Goss, the pastor of the Moody church has just returned from a vacation.

—Sam Jones, the Kentucky evangelist, has given a new proof of his eccentricity. In one place where he had held a very successful revival a purse of $1,500 was presented to him at the close. He took out $200 and returned the rest, directing the committee to distribute it among the families of saloon-keepers who had been converted during his meetings, and thus thrown out of employment.

—Returns made to the Japanese Government show 80,000 Christians in that empire.

—The translation of the Old Testament into Japanese will be completed early next year.

—The American Bible Society expends $150,000 a year in translating, publishing, and distributing the Bible in foreign lands.

—The Finns are for the most part a religious people, of the Lutheran faith; though there has come lately from the old world and settled among the many Finns in the iron regions of Northern Michigan, a fanatical sect, hostile to the Lutheran church, and holding principles subversive of the Gospel of Christ. It seems that persons qualified to preach to the Finnish emigrants cannot be found in this country in sufficient number, hence they are here as sheep without a shepherd. In Geauga county, O., there is a settlement of perhaps 100 Finns. They are scattered far and wide among American farmers. Rev. J. W. Lahde, of the seminary at Rock Island, Ill., has taken charge of a mission among the Finnish Lutherans in and near Ashtabula, O. And a Rev. Mr. Wahlstrom, who officiates in the Swedish and Finnish languages, is trying to gather a Finnish Lutheran congregation in Chicago. In response to a strong appeal, the Seaman's Missionary Society of the Lutheran church in Finland, have promised to send two missionaries to this country, one to New York city, and one to San Francisco, Cal. It is estimated that there are 8,000 Finns in Minnesota, Dakota and Manitoba. A new church paper called Walwoja has been published for the benefit of the Finns in this country. It is a neatly printed, well filled monthly of sixteen pages. By this means a large number will be reached.—Intelligencer.

—A member of a Dakota Baptist church has recently presented a tract of land to the church. The other members have had a ploughing bee, and mean to sow it down next year to wheat. They expect to secure several thousand dollars' worth of wheat for church uses.

—The following is the list of contributions of the Presbyterian church for the past year: Home missions, $632,906; foreign missions, $548,633; education, $115,873; publication, $34,218; church erection, $159,050; relief fund, $83,924; freedmen, $97,629; aid for colleges, $85,471; sustentation, $21,410; General Assembly, $55,200; Congregational, $7,541,017; miscellaneous, $922,855. The total is $10,298,186, an increase of over $128,500 over the previous year. The net increase of ministers is 133; of communicants, 28,793. The total of communicants is 643,735.

—Bishop William Taylor has succeeded in locating some of his large party of missionaries at Mayumba, two degrees south of the Equator. The rest are at present making Loanda their headquarters until they can be scattered over the Portuguese territory, to which they are the first Protestant missionaries.

—A missionary of the London Society gives an excellent description of the Brahmans, from which we quote. "Although the Brahmans form only three or four per cent of the population of South India, they constitute by far the most influential section, and occupy all the most prominent positions in the land. The intellectual professions are almost entirely in their hands. They are the ministers of State, the government officials, the local judges, the lawyers, the clerks in offices, the teachers in schools, the learned classes, and the accepted guides of the people. They are decidedly a fine race; handsome, well-made, comparatively light-complexioned, very careful in maintaining their purity of blood, very cleanly in person, strict teetotallers and vegetarians, and of such high mental endowments that there is no intellectual attainment to which they are not easily capable of rising. They are also polished in manners, and in many ways noble in bearing. On the other hand, they are exclusive, haughty, ambitious, cunning, and unscrupulous. It was the Brahmins principally who used to burn their widows, and who still doom them to life-long degradation; but in this matter a reformation is rapidly taking place."

—The Hospital Sunday Fund of London for the present year, after deducting current expenses, amounts to about $167,220, and the Hospital Saturday Fund to $80,000 more, or a total of about $250,000 for hospital charity. This sum will be divided among 101 hospitals and 53 dispensaries.

—Details of a remarkable religious movement in Central Africa are reported to the State Department of the United States Consul at Sierra Leone. An army composed of over 100,000 Mohammadan youth, and divided into three divisions, is operating throughout an extensive territory under the command of a native named Samudu, who claims that he has been called of God to suppress paganism and open the roads to the coast. Though the movement is spreading the Mohammedan faith in Africa, it is important in that it opens up to commerce a large and populous territory.

HOME HINTS.

ELECAMPANE AS AN ANTISEPTIC.

In a recent issue the Lancet mentions a series of articles which have appeared lately in a pharmaceutical paper of Barcelona, describing investigations which go to demonstrate that the chief active principle of the elecampane, helenina (from the systematic name of the plant, Inula helenium), is one of the most powerful antiseptics known, and at the same time free from the disagreeable odor of carbolic acid, which it might well replace.

The writer in the Boletin Farmaceutico applied an alcoholic solution of helenina to slices of veal, which, though kept at a temperature of 28 de. C. (82.4 de. Fah.); remained sweet for ten days, or until completely dry. An egg beaten up with nearly a pound of water was treated with 5 grains of helenina in six times its weight of alcohol remained unchanged for six days at a temperature of 82 de. Another egg similarly beaten up with water, without the drug, rapidly decomposed, and in twenty hours emitted a strong odor of sulphide of hydrogen. When to this solution about 7 grains of helenina were added, the offensive odor quickly disappeared and the mixture underwent no further change.

Similar experiments with urine, meat, and beaten-up eggs were made with carbolic, boracic, and salicylic acids instead of helenina; but much larger proportions of the acids were required to prevent putrefaction, and none of them were able to arrest putrefaction already begun, as the helenina had done. It was also observed that the aromatic smell of the materials from which the drug was extracted repelled all insects, even mosquitoes, from the house in which the experiments were made.

The Lancet adds that helenina has proved valuable in surgery as an antiseptic when carbolic and all other agents had failed; also that it has been given successfully in malarial fevers, and tuberculous, infantile, and catarrhal diarrhœa; and that it is expected to form an excellent substitute for carbolic acid in the Listerian system of aseptic surgery. Possibly the power of the drug to kill low organisms is what has made it useful as an internal and external remedy in tetter, psora, and other diseases of the skin, as mentioned in the Dispensatory. In this country it has been chiefly used of late in chronic diseases of the lungs. It is said to be sometimes beneficial when the chest trouble is attended with weakness of the digestive organs or with general debility. The ancients employed elecampane root very largely in medicine, and it would seem to be still more generally used in Europe than in America. If its alleged antiseptic and germicidal properties are confirmed by further tests, it is probable that the despised weed may rank the cinchona tree in sanitary and commercial importance.

The clever definition, "Weed—A plant whose uses are not discovered," thus receives a new and striking illustration. Who can tell how many other old weeds are awaiting new uses, to justify their persistence in living?

Elecampane is a coarse looking plant; the stem, rising to six feet, is furrowed, branching and downy above. The radical leaves are very large and rough, with serrated edges. The upper leaves are smaller, and embrace the stem. The flowers, which appear in July and August, are in heads, like sunflowers, and stand singly at the ends of the stem and branches. Their color is a golden yellow, odor aromatic. The stem is renewed every year; the root is perennial. The fresh root is very thick and branched, having whitish cylindrical ramifications with thread-like fibers. The outside is brown; within the root is whitish and fleshy. The agreeable aromatic odor of the root is increased by drying. The roots are dug in the fall and are best in their second year; when older they are apt to be woody. The dried root can be procured in almost every drug store, and might be worth trying as an agreeable and possibly efficient means of keeping apartments free from flies, mosquitoes, and other insects. The ozonizing power of the odor is likely to be valuable also in helping to destroy bad smells even if the active principle should be less efficient than the Spanish authorities affirm in preventing putrefaction and like unsanitary processes.

It may be worth while also to encourage the growth of the plant around outhouses, ditches, and drains, instead of the now fashionable but coarser and less efficient sunflower, for the purifying of the air and the prevention of malaria.—Scientific American.

The Facts Stated.

HON. THURLOW WEED ON THE MORGAN ABDUCTION.

This is a sixteen page pamphlet comprising a letter written by Mr. Weed, and read at the unveiling of the monument erected to the memory of Capt. William Morgan. The frontispiece is an engraving of the monument. It is a history of the unlawful seizure and confinement of Morgan in the Canandaigua jail, his subsequent conveyance by Freemasons to Fort Niagara, and drowning in Lake Ontario. He not only subscribes his NAME to the letter, but ATTACHES HIS AFFIDAVIT to it.

In closing his letter he writes: I now look back through an interval of fifty-six years with a conscious sense of having been governed through the "Anti-Masonic excitement" by a sincere desire, first, to vindicate the violated laws of my country, and next, to arrest the great power and dangerous influences of "secret societies."

The pamphlet is well worth perusing, and is doubtless the last historical article which this great journalist and politician wrote. [Chicago, National Christian Association.] Single copy, 5 cents.

HOLDEN WITH CORDS,

OR THE POWER OF THE SECRET EMPIRE. A faithful representation in story of the evil influence of Freemasonry, by E. E. FLAGG, author of "Little People," "A Sunny Life," etc. This is a thrillingly interesting story, accurately true to life because mainly a narration of historical facts. 384 pages. In cloth, $1; per doz., $9. Paper, 50c; per doz., $4.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

"There is no important history extant but has connected with it numerous other histories of which it was the initial point, or the dominating influence. The abduction and murder of Morgan set ten thousand secret springs in motion, as the surrender of the charters of so many lodges at that time, and the severing of their connection with the order of some forty thousand of its members indicated. This story is one of these histories, and is a collection of facts woven into a story. It cannot fail to be read with interest."—Free Methodist, Chicago.

"The republication of the Reform Story which run through the columns of the Cynosure for nearly a year is at last completed, and the book so anxiously expected by thousands of our readers has come from the press of Ezra A. Cook. The book is finely bound and fairly introduces the reader to the treasures within. The publisher has made occasional selections from Masonic works to verify the statements of the text; these make a helpful addition for some who can afford no more complete an armory of this kind."—Christian Cynosure.

"It is one of the most fascinating narratives we ever read and teaches its lesson in a manner not soon to be forgotten. It is evidently written for the heart and its words go to the heart. It is singularly free from wild denunciation. Those who are interested in the secret society question would do well to form the acquaintance of this interesting work."—Lutheran Standard, Columbus, O.

"The exciting scenes of the fall of 1826, at Batavia, N. Y., when Wm. Morgan was murdered by Masonry, are woven into the story so as to give the truth of History a setting of attractiveness. The forty chapters of the volume are soon compassed by the eager reader who begins the volume. This volume ought to be read and will be sought as its merits become known."—United Brethren in Christ.

"In an incidental way the story tells much about the manner of conducting lodges and much about the spirit and methods of Masonry. The story covers the period of the abduction and murdering of William Morgan. The strategic position from which the author writes put a charm in the book, while it gives a good opportunity to show the workings of the order. We wish all the people would read it."—Telescope.

"The story is intensely interesting and the author has succeeded in weaving into it a great deal of information in regard to this mysterious order, which is certainly startling if true, and he gives what seems to be undoubted evidence to prove his assertions. The book is one which should be read by both Masons and Antimasons."—Wayne Co. Herald.

"Our Anti-secret society friends are certainly entitled to great credit for their persistence in their efforts to expose and root out secretism. The object of the writer of this story is to present in its true light the crafty, unscrupulous and exceedingly hurtful influence of Masonry, the parent of all the orders."—Reformed Presbyterian and Covenanter.

FARM NOTES.

SEPTEMBER HINTS FOR FARM AND GARDEN.

In laying down a piece of land to grass, finish the dead-furrows with the shovel, leaving them broad and shallow, so that the mower runs easily over them, while the water is carried off as thoroughly as in a narrow furrow. A good rolling neatly finishes the whole work.

Finish digging the early potatoes before rains cause them to sprout. Keep the later kinds free from weeds, either by running a narrow cultivator through the rows, or by hand-pulling.

Buckwheat is easily injured by frost, and should be cut in good season. As it shells easily, cut with the dew upon it, let it cure in small, loose bunches, and draw it to the barn when slightly moist.

Stock should receive good care through this month. Summer heats still prevail, and hard work continues. Horses and oxen deserve good feeding and regular watering. Watch carefully the action of the horses' harness at points where galls or sores are likely to form. A daily bathing of the shoulders in salt and water will tend to harden the skin and prevent chafing.

ORCHARD AND FRUIT GARDEN.

The picking and marketing of early fall fruit is now in order. Special care should be taken in handling early varieties of apples and pears: slight bruises lead to speedy decay ...Send only the best fruit to market, well packed, and don't waste the rest, but preserve by drying. The patent driers are being improved each year, are of all sizes and prices,—and there is now no excuse for wasted fruit. ....Most pears should be picked before getting mellow; a very few kinds, like the Rostiezer, ripen well on the tree.... Where a fruit tree has not been trained from the start, the best time to note what prunning is needed, is just after the fruit has been picked. The cross-limbs and shoots will then make themselves noticeable, and can be cut out, or if large, marked with a string for late fall pruning.

MARKET AND KITCHEN GARDEN.

This is the month for sowing those crops which are to start, and remain all winter, for early spring growth, such as cabbage, cauliflowers, lettuce and onions. On account of the variable weather, it is well to sow twice, five or six days apart. The young plants are afterwards set out in cold frames to pass the winter. Sometimes they are thinned in the row, and covered with straw....Onions are usually started from the small sets, and come into use very early in the spring....Look over the cucumber pickles at least every other day, and keep them picked off close and of a uniform size. A pickle two inches long and half an inch thick, is the favorite size. Cut with a stem.—American Agriculturist.

HOW BEES PREDICT THE WEATHER.

No. 17 of Die Natur contains an article by Herr Emmerig, of Lauingen, on German bees as storm warners. From numerous observations the writer advances tentatively the theory that, on the approach of thunder storms, bees, otherwise gentle and harmless, become excited and irritable, and will at once attack any one, even the usual attendant, approaching their hives. A succession of instances are given in which the barometor and hygrometer foretold a storm, the bees remaining quiet, and no storm occurred; or the instruments gave no intimation of a storm, but the bees for hours before were irritable, and the storm came. He concludes, therefore, that the conduct of the bees is a trustworthy indication whether a storm is impending over a certain district or not, and that, whatever the appearances, if the bees are still, one need not fear a storm.

TIPS FOR HORSES' FEET.

There are many cases in which farm horses need no shoes in the summer, and would be better without them. A horse owned by the writer, had hard, dry hoofs, and contracted feet, which was caused by a natural tendency, increased by shoeing with high calks. For want of use, the frog had withered away, and the horse was always lame. The shoes were taken off, and tips only, were used. These were thin plates, reaching around the fore half of the hoofs only, to protect the toes from wearing away. The frog and the heels thus came to the ground at every step. the bars were able to spread, and the proper functions of the feet, to preserve healthful action and growth, were given full play The horse soon became sound, the frog grew healthfully, and the feet were in perfect order, while the expense of shoeing was greatly reduced.—American Agriculturist.

IN THE COILS; —OR— The Coming Conflict.

A NEW AND STRANGE STORY BASED ON STARTLING FACTS, VIVIDLY PORTRAYING A MYSTERIOUS AND DANGEROUS POWER AT WORK IN THE GOVERNMENT, THE CHURCH, AND THE HOME.

"All will agree that this is a powerfully written story."—Evangelist, (Chicago, Ills.)

"A book which we trust may have a wide circulation."—National Baptist, (Philadelphia.)

"So intensely interesting did I find it that it was hard to pause until the last sentence was read. This work places the author high among the writers of fiction."—W. W. Barr, D. D. in Christian Instructor, (Philadelphia.)

"Unless we are greatly mistaken, the work will do more to awaken the American church and people to the evils of Freemasonry than any other book recently published."—Evangelical Repository.

"The book will create a sensation in Masonic circles, and evoke criticism of a most relentless character. The courage of the author in attacking such a rock-rooted bulwark as Freemasonry is something to admire, Fanatic though he be."—Nebraska Watchman.

"Light is needed on this subject and needed badly, and we welcome this contribution to the literature of anti-secretism, and cordially commend it to the favorable attention of our readers."—United Presbyterian, (Pittsburgh.)

"A charming work, fit to be classed with 'Uncle Tom's Cabin;' it is indeed less a work of fiction. The volume is as valuable as a work of reference as it is agreeable, truthful and useful. Our young folks will not leave the book, if they begin it, till they 'see how it turns out.'"—Cynosure, (Chicago, Ills.)

IN BRIEF.

A professor at the University in Berlin, having tried it, says that it takes ten times as long to commit to memory eighty meaningless syllables as it does to master eighty that have meaning.

Agents of the Board of Health in New York have been analyzing the soda water sold by druggists, but have found only four samples out of fifty where traces existed of the lead, copper or sinc lining of the pipes.

England does one third of all the banking business of the world. The Bank of England holds one-seventeenth of all the deposits of Great Britain. The total amount held is, in round numbers, $27,000,000,000.

The ex-Empress Eugene is making a round of European watering places as the Countess de Pierrefonds. The detective police of Carlsbad, learning that the assumed title was fictitious, reported her as an adventuress.

The English health authorities are sorely exercised over the importation of "artificial honey," composed of wheat or corn starch treated with acid, the product of American ingenuity. Detection by the taste is impossible.

An English writer points out the probability that a smoky atmosphere is not a wholly unmitigated evil, since its carbon and sulphur must absorb many germs of disease, and tend to prevent the spread of epidemics.

The experiment of a language club is about to be tried in New York, having for its object the preservation of the English language in its unadulterated purity. Among the principal movers in the matter are Pres. Barnard, of Columbia College, Robert Collyer, and others.

Jews-harps were among the curious items of traffic carried out by Bishop Taylor's company of missionaries. It is said that "the idea was suggested by a story of a commercial traveler in Africa, who, failing otherwise to attract the attention of the natives, mounted a rock and played on his jews-harp so effectively that the natives became infatuated with the instrument, and gladly exchanged a pound of ostrich feathers for a jews-harp."

Some years ago, travelers in Dalmatia noticed large tracts of land covered by a wild flower, near which not a sign of insect life was visible. The bloom was the pyrethrum, whose odor deals death to the lower forms of life, and whose powdered leaves form the basis of "insect powders." The seed of this flower was distributed in the United States; and a Dalmatian has been growing it with great success in Stockton, Cal.

Mr. Eli Wright, of Youngstown, Ohio, believes that he was the youngest Union soldier in the war of the rebellion. When he enlisted, in 1862, he was 12 years, 2 months old, and at the age of 13 participated in the battle of Cedar Mountains. He served in Battery B, First Ohio Light Artillery, until the close of the war, and now weighs 283 pounds.

It has been mentioned as a curious fact that the wife of Mr. Chandler, the ex-Secretary of the Navy, should have been the daughter of a former Senator Hale, while the wife of Senator Hale of the present day is the daughter of a former Secretary Chandler. No relationship exists between either of the families. One has a son named Hale Chandler, and the other a son named Chandler Hale.

One of the greatest curiosities of the present day, found among the pines of Central Wisconsin, was discovered near Knowlton, a few weeks ago. It was in the form of a petrified squirrel, and about the size of a common squirrel, and was taken from the heart of a tree by some woodmen. It was of a brownish color, as hard as a rock, and was "as natural as life," even to the kink in its long, bushy tail. The curiosity was careful packed and sent by William Mulhollen, the owner, to President Cleveland, from whom a personal letter of thanks was received by the sender, saying that it would be carefully preserved and placed in the public museum at Washington.

At one of their Sunday picuics in this city the Anarchists spent more than $600 for cigars and beer. Upon some of the banners borne in the procession and standing about the grounds were such mottoes as "Our Children cry for Bread!" So the W. C. T. U. is after all the great anti-monopolist.

The Freemasons of America are continually pointing with pride to the fact that the English Grand Master is a leading member of the Royal family. It is also a fact worthy of the notice of all Masons who respect social morality that it is reported that the same Grand Master is the greatest dancer in England, and the Independent lately says of him: "Miss Calely, a young lady of great beauty, is to be added to the list of Englishwomen who have positively declined to permit the Prince of Wales to be introduced to them, regarding his acquaintance as a social stigma." It is well enough to put these facts together when making up the moral status of a society which has continued for so many years at its head such a social leper as the Prince is reported to be.

The struggle between Freemasonry and Catholicism in Brazil a few years ago will be remembered. It was altogether a political squabble for supremacy and resulted somewhat unfavorably for the Bishop of Pernambuco, who championed the papists. If it had any practical influence it was only such as was easily counteracted by the secession of the Grand Master of English Freemasons, the Marquis of Ripon, for the Roman Catholic fold. In Peru the lodge is also attempting to get a foothold, and although under an interdict they have been bold enough to give out that a Masonic temple was to be built in Lima. The Roman Catholic bishop called the attention of the Minister of Justice to the report, and received answer that by virtue of the constitution the government has not permitted and will never permit the erection of a Masonic temple in Lima.

Among the "just things" which should first of all be done for the workingman, is to provide for him or assist him to provide for himself, a Sabbath; not alone a time of rest, but also those sacred privileges that hallow the day. And before all corporations, railways, factories, or other private enterprises, the Government should begin the work. When it is remembered that the Post Office department keeps up a continual strain upon its men in every large city, and sets the example of running its cars on the Lord's Day, it is not so surprising that many capitalists follow so pernicious an example. In Chicago out of 481 employes only thirty have the Sabbath wholly to themselves, and in Philadelphia 300 men are at their ordinary work on that day. These facts, well says the Christian Statesman, are "enough to stir the blood of every Christian man, and to secure general co-operation in the effort to right this wrong."

The city of Louisville made an inglorious day for her history last Thursday. The sale of the one hundred thousandth hogshead of tobacco was made the pretext for a great celebration with a procession eight miles long which proceeded to the exposition building where the hogshead was sold for $2,023. This was glorying in a shame, literally. Such a procession, instead of drawing into its line the business interests of a great city, should be led by the victims of the tobacco poison. Let General Grant and his patient physicians and mourning family, Senator Hill, and the scores of cancer-inflicted men begin the line. Let them be followed by the thousands and millions of diseased and poisoned young men of America, the millions of little children who have inherited a diseased system from tobacco-using parents, the millions of druukards who began their career with a cigar or a quid. Let the smoking cars be coupled on, reeking with filth and profanity. Could such a dismal procession be formed, and drag its painful length through the land, it would be followed everywhere by groans and lamentation. And whither would it be tending?

London is annoyed, perhaps alarmed, by Socialist meetings and riots, as well as Chicago. A riot last week Monday was followed on the Sabbath by an immense demonstration in which forty thousand persons participated. Though the speakers violently denounced the present order of society the day passed peacefully. The authorities wisely arranged to keep the police out of sight, so that there might be less temptation to those riotously disposed. A powerful impetus has been giveu to popular agitation of this kind by the exposures of the traffic iu female virtue by the Pall Mall Gazette, supported by the immense demonstrations of the Salvation Army. The article of Cardinal Manning in the current North American Review is a clear and forcible explanation of the fearful condition of English laws in respect to this crime. Our English correspondent, Rev. John Boyes, writes us also on this topic. Mr. Stead, editor of the Gazette, has, after being subjected to severe and unjust rebuke by a magistrate, been committed for trial, the case growing out of his exposures. The end of this business is not yet and the volcanoes in some of our American cities may yet be uncapped. The News is attempting the business in Chicago, and with some popular effect.

The terrible outrage upon the Chinese miners at Rock Springs, Colorado, has been carefully investigated by the government directors of the Union Pacific road, in whose employ the murdered men were. Every facility was given the citizens and miners engaged in the massacre, to explain their case, which they did fully until the circumstances immediately connected with the outrage were brought up, when a uniform refusal to say anything was given. The personal testimony of no Chinaman could be obtained until there was a positive assurance on the part of the committee and the Chinese cousuls of New York and San Francisco that they should not be molested. The directors report to the government, "We find such a condition of affairs here, as, in our opiniou, endangers the property of the road, jeopards the intersets of the government, and calls for prompt interference." Colonel Bee, employd as counsel by the Chinese government, says that all the legal proceedings have been a merc farce, and he will call for prosecution in the U. S. courts. It has been found that of the men immediately engaged in the massacre not one is American-born! This fact adds to the shame of the affair, and will justly increase the prejudice against some classes of foreign immigrants. But a deeper shame was that the Knights of Labor lodges championed the cause of the murderers, and threatened a general strike all along the road if the Chinese were again set to work. Mr. Callaway, the general manager, was not intimidated by their threats, but sent them to the mines last week. Notice was given the striking miners that they would not be again employed. Mr. Charles Francis Adams, Jr., president of the road, agrees with the manager in making an issue with the lodge at this point, and if a strike is ordered will turn over the road to the government, and let bullets and bayonets be the argument for the Mollie Maguires of the Knights of Labor.

The roysterers of Appletree Tavern, London, in 1717, very well understood that the organization they were founding had nothing in its constitutional principles to interfere with the indulgence of its members in social vices. Hence the Prince of Wales can remain Grand Master, murderers like those of Morgan and Ellen Slade can be defended and set free, and lechery and drunken debauchery such as attended the Knight Templars "conclaves" at Washiugton, Chicago and San Francisco has no rebuke. The following story of an old house in Grosvenor street, West London, called the "Feathers," after the well-known arms of the Prince of Wales, illustrates the fact that other secret orders are like Masonry in moral character: "A lodge of Odd-fellows was held at this house, into the private chamber of which George, Prince of Wales, one night intruded very abruptly with a roystering friend. The society was, at the moment, celebrating some of its awful mysteries, which no unitiated eye may behold, and these were witnessed by the profane intruders. The only way to repair the sacrilege was to make the Prince and his companion 'Odd-fellows,' a title they certainly deserved as richly as any members of the club. The initiatory rites were quickly gone through, and the Prince was chairman for the remaiuder of the evening. In 1851 the old public house was pulled down and a new gin palace built on its site, in the parlor of which the chair used by the distinguished Odd-fellow is still preserved, along with a portrait of his Royal Highness in the robes of the order." Wesley's old pulpit would hardly be chosen as a gin palace advertisement.

WEEK-DAY SERMON.

BY E. E. FLAGG.

It seems to me that one great advantage of reading the Bible through in course is that by so doing we notice many of its truths in new relatious. The Mosaic code may not be in itself entertaining reading, but what a grand humanity it teaches! For all "the mistakes of Moses" I wish some of our legislators could go to school to him. I thiuk they would graduate with new and enlarged ideas on several important subjects.

For instance, if he could bring his wise and rigid system of sanitary laws to bear upon the Chinese questiou, how soon it might be settled in a way that would involve no broken treaties and no outrage on human rights. Would he allow, as do our city authorities, that close herding together in filth and wretcheduess of which the long roll of infant mortality every year is only the natural result? Would foreigners be permitted to override American liberty with Continental license, if with us as with the ancient Jew there was one law alike for the native born and for the stranger within our gates? So with the labor problem. Moses recognized the great truth which, if not laid down in our present systems of political economy, will be when future generations have learned to base this grandest of human sciences on the broad ground of Christian ethics instead of a cold, prudent, calculating selfishness, that all law should be framed especially for the advantage of the poor, or in other words should favor the many rather than the few. Instead, we allow powerful lobbies to push bills in the interest of capitalists, of monopolists, of shrewd, selfish men who are thus given a double and treble advantage over the great mass of their weaker fellow-beings. I don't think it would take Moses long to settle the liquor or the Mormon question, but I imagine he would feel a little contempt for the blunders of our American law-givers who, if they had a tithe of his brains, his conscience, or his courage, would not ignore these burning questions, or stick fast in a quagmire every time they try to handle them.

Leaving this particular branch of the subject, however, there are wonderful glints of God's character to be discerned in some of the least devotional parts of Scripture. Note the reason why Leah is given the blessing denied her sister. "The Lord saw that she was hated," or loved less than her beautiful rival, and the great heart of Infinite Pity yearned toward the neglected wife and desired to make it up to her in the love of childreu and the honor attached to their possession. How that single touch from the pen of inspiration brings ont the Fatherhood of God! What a sense of personal nearness it gives us. What a comforting thought for all his despised children. For every cross he has a crown to bestow; for every trial patiently borne some blessing far outweighing the pain. And in the beautiful words of one who has just dropped her pen forever:—

"As all feeble babes that suffer,
Toss and cry and will not rest,
Are the ones the tender mother
Holds the closest, loves the best—
So when we are weak and wretched,
By our sins weighed down, distressed,
Then it is that God's great patience
Holds us closest, loves us best."

ISAAC AND ISHMAEL.

Isaac and Ishmael, sons of Abraham, were half-brothers and with their father, knew only Elohim Yehovah or Yah as Supreme Diety. All the family spake the same language and pronounced the name of the Creator alike. The name El or Elohim appears to be very ancient and was perhaps spoken by Adam and his antediluvian descendants. Isaac was an ancestor of the Hebrew or Jewish people, and Ishmael of the Arabic which are also very numerous. In process of time the language of these people became greatly different yet retained a likeness in many respects. We are able to consult both these languages at the present day and to compare them with each other, one a living tongue and the other not in use as such. The following in Arabic is the first verse of the 6th chapter of Joshua which we may compare with the same verse in the Hebrew Bible: "faqala'l laho liyushua undur qad sallamtu ariha wamalikaha fi yadaika wahum jabahiratu'l basalati." If this were printed in Arabic characters we might compare: first, the name of the Deity; second, that of Joshua; third, the vowel signs above and below the consonants; fourth, the gutterals, etc.; fifth, the word sallamtu; sixth, Jericho; seventh, wamalikaha; eight, yadaika; ninth, jahabiratu; tenth, the manner of writing and reading from right to left. In this short passage I have made ten comparisons. Surely Abraham's two sons did not so much resemble each other in person as these two languages at this distant day.

Although it is probable, as I have observed, that Isaac and Ishmael spake the name of deity as did their father, we now note a difference in the Arabic and Hebrew, yet there is a similarity. Allah, Allahon branches from El, Elohim. If the worship of Elohim saved Abraham and the Jews, did the worship of Allahon save in like manner the Ishmaelite? About the same idea is conveyed by it to the Arabic intelligence. Why send them missionaries since they are already devout? Why may not the Freemason's G. A. O. T. U. save the Mason, since the name conveys the same idea of almighty power?

Now that worship is of divine authority which God institutes and reveals to man in the Gospel and not the worship and forms of it which the natural man may institute for himself. We are informed by the Apostle John in his Gospel that if any man adds to or takes from the gospel revelation God shall take away his portion from the book of life. The Ishmaelite, besides changing somewhat the name of Deity, which may not be so important, has added that false and lying prophet—"God is God and Mohammed is his prophet." Here is enmity at once with the Christian religion. The Freemason and Odd-fellow have taken from the Gospel; Christ being excluded. Their ritual is anti-Christ. Here is enmity. Their deity at once becomes the equivalent of the Arabic, the Roman, the Buddhist, the Greek, or any deity in all heathendom, the conception of which is almighty power. No Christ, no atonement, no mediation, no intercession. Although the divine Author of the Christian religion is jealous of his own glory, yet you have Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, Quakers, etc., in large numbers who have struck hands in the dark lodges with a heathenish anti-Christ which seeks to pervade all lands.

I have already said the name Elohim is modified in Arabic which I considered less important than some other things, yet what would we think of a Methodist or Quaker community which had adopted the plan of persistently calling Jesus, Joshua? in their prayers, sermons, and at all times calling him Joshua, the two words importing similarly? Zacharias, of prophetic spirit, could not name Johu even after himself, and a mighty angel descended from heaven and announced the name Jesus, yet suppose a few Methodists or Quakers call it Joshua? Would not even this be less enormous than to fellowship those accursed fraternities as some of them do which cast him out of the oath-bound lodge?

Quaker Boy.

ANNIVERSARY OF JOHN THE BAPTIST.

On a Masonic celebration of June 28th, called John the Baptist's day in the lodge calendar, in Bellefontaine, O., Rev. F. M. Foster of the Covenanter church writes thus to the Examiner of that place:

In your courtesy, may we remark with reference to the "Anniversary of St. John the Baptist?"

Appropriate services were held in the Lutheran church, June 28th. The Masons of Bellefontaiue, who attended the church in a body, had their attention directed to the words: "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world," and "Why eateth your Master with publicans and sinners?"—texts very appropriate to any occasion and to any class of men.

What did that auniversary service mean? Does it give a proper impression as the religious character of Masonry?

It meant nothing, in one way, but a few men, who broke the Sabbath by repairing to their lodge, attending church. In another way, it meant, by implication, that Jesus Christ is the Saviour believed in and worshiped by Masonry. We write to disabuse the minds of the unsophisticated as to any connection between Jesus and Masonry. The Christians feel the necessity of doing something to free the order from the shame of denying Christ. They tell the people they went to church. It is noted with satisfaction that they did. Right glad would every one be if those who are seldom out of their places on street corners, would go to church every Sabbath. It will be an occasion for universal joy when all men go to church. But it is to be remembered that that service in no sense represented Masonry. How do we know? Where is the proof? We know it from the words of an intelligent Mason. Prof. Henry Whitworth in the Examiner of March 6, said, "Jews and Mohammedans are equally at home with Christians in the order." We shall suppose that Prof. Whitworth has told the truth. If he has, it is likewise true that the Masons in Bellefontaine attended church not as Masons, for the Jew and Deist would not be "equally at home with the Christian" while listening to the words, "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world." They would be scoffers. They would not go to a service the object of which was to worship Jesus the Saviour of the world. As a rule Jews, Deists and moralists are not hypocrites.

Further, the Masons of Bellefontaine attended Christian service on that "anniversary" simply through the influence of a few Christian men. If the majority of the lodge had been Jews, as is the case in many places, that service would have been held in a Jewish Synagogue where the name of Jesus—the Christian's Redeemer and Lord—is referred to only as an impostor who was justly put to death. If the majority had been Unitarians who deny the doctrine of the Trinity, they would have attended a service where even the existence of Jesus is denied. If the majority had been Turks, they would have "attended in a body" a Turkish mosque, perhaps saying as they went, "Allah is but one God and Mohammed is his prophet." If the majority had been Deists, they would likely have had a performance on the street. The character of the service depended upon the members. The few church members in the lodge here have tried to make an appearance of Christianity for Masonry. The disguise is apparent. To declare to the world that "Jew and Mohammedan are equally at home with Christians in the order," and at the same time try to make it appear Christian is a chasm too broad to be successfully straddled. No. Masonry need never make the attempt to claim Jesus as one of their objects of worship. Nor need they claim any of his illustrious servants as their Most Puissant, Sublime, Grand, Perfect, Illustrious, Supreme—we shall not say fools, for that would appear to be making sport. For these, earnest Christians have neither time, money, nor inclination. There is more important work engagiug their attention than euticing free men behind bolted doors, guarded by the tyler with drawn sword, administering an oath which invokes upon the candidate double damuatiou—as in the Knight Templar degree—if he ever reveals, etc. It is sufficient to arouse the Christiau's indignation to see Masonry endeavor to pilot itself into public favor by claiming the illustrious followers of Jesus as members. Let the writer assure the reader that the diverse religions from which the order draws its members—Mohammedan, Jews, Deists, Free Thinkers, and men skeptical upon every form of morality and duty—make the line, of necessity, run back, if back it goes, through those other classes whose chief excited the curiosity of Adam and Eve by telling them if they would join they would see great things: "Your eyes shall be opened and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil." They joined. They fell. So does every one that passes behiud the curtain of the lodge. He is now bound by oaths, and curses, and death penalties. This is one of the devil's schemes to hold the world in subjection. But thanks be unto God that Jesus Christ, who charged his disciples, "If they shall say unto you he is in the secret chamber, believe it not," has come to "bring to light the hidden things of darkness," to "proclaim liberty to the captive and the opening of the prison to them that are bound."

We mean to speak very plainly. We are interested in the spiritual welfare of the people of Bellefontain. Why is the moral tone so low? Why not more than one-third of the population in church on Sabbath? Why so much riding and visiting ou the Sabbath by men who claim to be Christian? Why so much street-loafing by men who pretend to be Christian? Why do men whose names are on church rolls take the train on the Sabbath? Why do members of a church go to the postoffice on the Sabbath? What is it that is eating at the vitals of the Christianity of our town? There are many things. Among the many we mention Masonry as one of the chief. It teaches a religion without a Christ. The worship of Jesus and obedience to his law may be very nice, but not altogether necessary. You can be a good Mason and take the train, buggy-ride, visit, stay away from church, go to the postoffice, never have family worship, nor secret prayer, make no pretensions to personal piety, etc. And while the larger number of the Christian members would not say "Masonry is a good enough religion for me," yet it is having an influence seriously detrimental to their souls, and is making of them examples which cause others to reject God's offer of salvation. This is not a conclusion hastily arrived at. It has been reached through five years of observation. It is so apparent that we are astonished that those who are interested in the elevation of men should in any way be connected with the above institution. It is carrying a serious responsibility. "The night is far spent, the day is at hand: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armour of light." Rom. 13 12.

But to return to our more immediate subject. While the few Masons in Bellefontaine are attending church, and pretending by implication that Masonry worships Jesus, a lodge of their Jewish brethren in New York are crying "Crucify him! crucify him!" And a lodge of their Unitarian brethren answer there are not three persons in the Godhead. Take away your Christ! And a lodge of Deists casts the same in their teeth. And yet these very charitable Christians presume to see no inconsistency.

For want of self-restraint many men are engaged all their lives in fighting with difficulties of their own making, and rendering success impossible by their own cross-grained ungentleness; whilst others, it may be much less gifted, make their way and achieve success by simple patience, equanimity, and self-control.—Smiles.

Hasty conclusions are the mark of a fool; a wise man doubteth; a fool rageth and is confident; the novice saith, "I am sure that it is so;" the better learned answers, "Peradventure it may be so; but, I pray thee, inquire." It is a little learning, and but a little, which makes men conclude hastily. Experience and humility teach modesty and fear.—Jeremy Taylor.

POPULARITY VERSUS PRINCIPLE.

"Thou shalt not contemn the public gods." For the man or woman whose supreme aim in life is personal popularity, this is the first and great commandment. These few words constitute an entire system of mundane ethics worthy to be inscribed in letters of gold over every portal to worldly recognition and success. To set at naught the law of the land brings judicial punishment; to defy the ruling fashion or opinion is to invoke a penalty yet more severe—social ostracism.

No task can be more thankless than that of the individual who arraigns existing customs or opinions, even though, by reason of such arraignment, these customs and opinions are gradually reformed. To protest is to be unpopular; to oppose the established order is suicide of worldy fortune, ease and happiness. When Curtius threw himself into the yawning gulf to save his country, that act deprived him personally of any country to save or lose.

One's secret opinions are one's own, but policy dictates that, if unpopular, they be cherished in secret. "Wherever a great soul utters its thought, there is Golgotha," says Heinrich Heine. It is not Golgothas, it is nice, sunshiny, comfortable places the natural man seeks in this world.

The safest place is on the fence. "Keep out of the melee," says worldly prudence. The non-committal man is always at an advantage. In every dispute he is chosen umpire. That supposed bulwark of free institutions, trial by jury, recognizes this fact. That "intelligent juror," upon whom such precious stores of legal lore and eloquence are lavished in our courts of justice, who is called to decide such momentous questions, has had his present greatness thrust upon him by simply declaring on oath that he has formed no opinion whatever on the matter at issue.

Next to that golden silence so vaunted by Carlyle, nothing so well serves the purpose of the seeker after popularity as a small collection of little expletives. Real words are weak in comparison with "Oh!" "Ah!" and "Indeed!" uttered with the appropriate intonation. A judicious use of these and similar interjections may extricate the person who seeks to remain non-committal from the most perplexing dilemma. They bridge over the yawning chasm of vacuity, helping one to avoid the Sylla of partisanship on the one hand and the Charybdis of indifference on the other. These insignificant syllables may convey worlds of meaning and yet prove harmless to him who utters them.

Becoming all things to all men and saying flattering things to everybody, are twin arts in which the professionally popular man must be a virtuoso. One can be urbanity itself to those he at heart despises. "My dear sir, I am charmed to see you; you shall be hanged in half an hour," said in his blandest accents a royal governor of colonial Virginia to the leader of a rebellion whom he had at last succeeded in capturing.

Treat the worst of men, if he chances to occupy an exalted position, as if he were an angel of light, is one of the wisest maxims of worldly prudence. "When in Rome do as the Romans do," is another. Custom, use and fashion are only different expressions of the prevailing taste. To deviate from them is to set one's self up as a target for neglect and ridicule. One whose chief ambition is to please, must be careful not to deviate one jot from the conventional standards. Were he an Adonis in beauty, a Solomon in wisdom, or a Bayard in chivalry, he could not safely venture on an outre hat or coat. The villain is seldom suspected until he has won some repute for good qualities, but the man who is eccentric in dress or manner is condemned at the first glance, and soon learns that he would better violate a law of the decalogue than a social canon.

The great German author, Jeal Paul, whea a sruggling student at Leipzig University, was ignominiously thrust out of a small summer cottage he had rented in a garden of the city suburbs, because unable to afford the expense of a daily hair-dresser, he had the courage to dispense with the queue universally worn by gentlemen of that day.

"De gustibus non est disputandum" is a maxim old and trite. Conventional laws are by no means like those of the Medes and Persians, and yet for the time being their sovereignty is absolute. The private citizen whom the civil law has made neither judge, juryman nor executioner, exercises the functions of all three in a case of social dereliction. There is no tyranny like that of custom.

One whose highest earthly aim is to please, must bow in abject submission to this tyranny. He can afford no sacrifice, small or great. He will no more seek to lead in a new fashion than in a new reform.

The connoisseur in the arts of popularity has no end of friends. He carefully studies human nature and pays due tribute to its weaknesses. To him language is given not to express, but to conceal his thoughts. In visiting even the most indifferent family, he inquires with an air of affectionate concern after the pet of each member, whether it be a pet child, a pet kitten, or a pet neuralgia. He knows that flattery, to be effective, need be only judiciously applied; he has the "art to conceal his art." He is sure to extol the dullest child of the household as the brightest, to address the young daughter, whose murders of music are most shocking, as a connoisseur, and the one who dabbles in decorative horrors as an artist. This adept in the art of pleasing gauges and graduates his praises according to the idiosyncrasies of each person, paying due regard to the fitness of time and place.

The master of these varied arts of popularity has a good time in this world. No deep convictions trouble him, no fixed principles, no sense of moral responsibility. To him there are no standards of truth, no laws of right or wrong. He fawns, he he cringes, he palavers, he cajoles. He smiles and smiles, even though at heart he may be a villain. He glides on smoothly with the current or trims his sails to the winds. But his winning wiles and graces die with him. He has made no real impress on the world. His renown passes like a summer sunbeam, and his summer friends forget him.

It were worse than folly to decry these outward graces that lend such charm to life. When united with inward worth, they make the perfect man. "People are like bullets," says Jean Paul. "The smoother they are the further they go." Other things being equal, the suave Chesterfields are greatly to be preferred to the bearish Carlyles. But it is not these superficial traits which make up Lord Chesterfield's heartless code of life and manners, that enlighten, renovate and save humanity. Character must form the basis of every true and noble life. They whose names come down to us as educators and reformers, as prophets and martyrs, have formed their lives after higher models than the shifting phases of current fashion or opinion. They have had their reward,—ignominy in their own day, apotheosis in ours.

"They were stoned, they were sawn asunder, were tempted, were slain with the sword; they wandered about in sheep-skins, and goat-skins, being destitute, afflicted, tormented." Thus writes the great apostle of an elect company "of whom the world was not worthy," he himself soon to be enrolled with the number of those who having fought the good fight and kept the faith, had passed through martyrdom to their reward.

Socrates, for contemning the false gods of his time, drank the deadly hemlock. Luther, denounced by the popular voice as antichrist, did not have a smooth, flowing pathway through this world. Dante wrote his divine drama amid the woes of exile. The great truth discovered by Galileo was in his own day deemed heresy worthy of death. Savonarola, Calvin, Knox and Wesley were popular only with what the world called a dissenting rabble. Within the memory of a generation still living the name of Abolitionists was a stigma, while slavery in the popular regard, was a divine institution.

The age of martyrdom for opinion's sake is over; the tyranny that now awes and subjects men is not that of church or state; it is the tyranny of established usage and custom. There are yet many popular idols, and woe to the iconoclast who would break or desecrate them!

Great questions yet confront the world. Great moral and intellectual battles are yet to be fought and won. Never was there more need of character, courage and principle than now. Yet, let him who attempts that unpopular role of reformer be sure of his calling and of the sincerity of his motives; sure that he is opposing real evils, and not running a senseless tilt against wind-mills. Let him begin his work with a reform of self. Conventional usage is not a thing to be despised. Worldly applause and popularity are pleasant things. But they are not the things most worth striving for, not the measure of the noblest lives. While the shallow, baseless renown of the time-server passes with him, that of the hero of conviction and duty goes on assuming grander proportions from age to age.—Francis A. Shaw, in the Interior.

—The National Conference of churches receives continually more and better endorsement. The Indiana Wesleyan conference have added to the list of delegates appointed; the Whitewater United Brethren conference has also appointed a delegation. Dr. Gifford, a prominent Baptist pastor of Boston, endorses the proposition and will co-operate as much as possible. Dr. A. J. Gordon, of the same city, is opposed to all secret societies, but will not be able to attend the conference.

THE RIGHT OF WOMEN TO PREACH.

Our conservative Congregational brethren have recently ordained a woman to preach the Gospel. For many years among the Quakers, Baptists and Methodists, women have preached with marked acceptance and good results. 1 Cor. 14: 34—35, and 1st Tim. 2: 12 have often been qouted as forbidding women to take part in public worship. Careful scholarship, however, has discovered a difference in meaning between the Greek words lalein, and didaskein, which acts were forbidden to women in the church, and propheetueine which was permitted and even encouraged. It is claimed that Paul only meant to advise the over-zealous Corinthian women not to turn the prayer meeting into a debating society. First Cor. 11: 5 shows clearly that he was willing women should both pray and prophesy if they would only do so with propriety. Much mischief has often been done by wresting one or two passages of Scripture so as to make them teach a false doctrine. The Bible teaches no unreasonable thing and its direction on any subject is discovered by taking it has a whole and not by magnifying and distorting one or two verses.

SOME PERSONAL EXPERIENCES.

"I used to sell badges and sashes in this city," remarked one of the men recently reclaimed from strong drink.

"What kind of badges?"

"Why," said he, "the badges of secret societies."

"Do you think your connection with these societies had anything to do with your becoming a drunkard?" we inquired.

"I presume it had," said he. "The night I joined the Knights of Pythias, I didn't get home till three o'clock in the morning. When my initiation was over, the boys said 'Let's go and have a drink." This was the way that lodge nights generally ended. When I got home that night my wife said,

"If this is the way the Knights of Pythias do, you have had enough of it."

"I noticed the same custom with the Odd-fellows, and, in fact, with all the secret societies to which I belonged. This is the worst thing I know about them. After the lodge meetings, the members go to the saloons and drink and play cards and billiards. Many of them also went to houses of ill fame. I knew many married men to do this when their wives supposed they were detained at the lodge. Yes, men get bad habits by such societies. It is hard for a man to resist the invitation to drink with his lodge companions."

To our astonishment this man stated without any question to suggest it that one great objection to these lodges was that they rejected Christ. This fact he observed while attending the meetings.—American.

FREE THINKERS WANT RECOGNITION.

The Free Thinkers have been holding a convention in Albany. We were honored with a special invitation to be present, inclosing a card entitling us to a seat of honor. But the topics announced and the names of the speakers did not attract us to this convention, and the reports of the secular press lead us to pity the poor creatures that went to Albany to endure the infliction of such brainless and blasphemous utterances as were there heard. One of the resolutions discussed and adopted was this:

That it is time for liberal and secular societies to take the place of churches and priests in the social recognition and celebration of those great events of human life—birth, marriage and death.

We were not aware that "churches and priests" had anything especially to do with the first named great event of human life. This is generally supposed to be the special province of the medical profession. As to "marriage and death" we should think it was "about time" that they received recognition from these "liberal and secular societies." They certainly have shown a surprising indifference to the one and a conspicuous carelessness as to the other.—Baptist Weekly.

Luther on Choosing a College.—"I am much afraid," said Martin Luther in his appeal to the Emperor and Christian nobility of the German nation, "that the universities will prove to be the great gates of hell, unless they diligently labor in explaining the Holy Scriptures, and engraving them in the hearts of youth. I advise no one to place his child where the Scriptures do not reign paramount. Every institution in which men are not unceasingly occupied with the Word of God must become corrupt."

LODGE CHARITY AND INTIMIDATION IN ST. PAUL.

St. Paul, Minn.

Editor Christian Cynosure:—Recently I delivered a review of the sermons of the Jackson street M. E. pastor on Freemasonry and Odd-fellowship. The Pioneer Press reporter called it "a scathing diatribe." Now that is just what anyone might think upon hearing the whole truth about these orders for the first time. That is just what that reporter thought and said. Probably he has never been lodge-demonized and mesmerized.

That lodge "prelate," the Jackson street M. E. pastor, I consider, insulted the widows and orphans of Odd-fellows when he fixed the brand of charity objects upon them for receiving a cord of wood and a pair of shoes from the Odd-fellows; because if the husband and father had not paid the Odd-fellows for the wood and shoes before he died they would not have received them, and not even then had he failed to pay his last month's lodge dues. The decision of the Grand Lodge of this State is that if the Odd-fellow has not paid his dues for the month previous to his disability he is not to receive any benefits. And in the face of this the Odd-fellow stands in the Methodist pulpit and blows his trumpet thus, we, "The Odd-fellows have spent thirty millions in charity." Is not that an insult to every disabled Odd-fellow, and every Odd-fellow's widow and orphan who receive benefits from the lodge? Why should their orphans be branded as "charity boys," and "charity girls," when that pastor carries them a pair of shoes purchased out of the money their father gave the pastor before he died? He said, "Odd-fellowship, by its charities, puts the church to shame." Is he trying to serve two masters? Which would he serve, Odd-fellowship or the church? Boasting of his Odd-fellowism, he says, "To carry a widow a cord of wood, to put shoes on the orphan's feet, is a greatness that stamps the meanness out of us." But how does it appear that the Odd-fellow is any greater than a faithful errand boy or a clerk in a shoe store? It seems to me that he is more like a confidence operator, trying to inveigle people into his secret lodge worship. Christian charity is described by Christ thus: "Lord, hoping for nothing again" (Luke 6: 35); but of sinners he says, "Sinners lend to sinners, to receive as much again." v. 34. It seems to me that Masons and Odd-fellows do as sinners do and call it charity.

In St. Paul we are building a new court house, and the Freemasons want to dedicate it to paganism by laying the corner-stone. Many of the people do not like it. But the pulpit and press are so badly snared by the secret lodges that they dare not allow an honest protest against it. And it seems likely that the spirit of Balaam will have its own way. Last evening I handed a few lines to the clerk of the Pioneer Press upon the subject, and paid him $1.35 to put it in the place for announcements, but instead there was an announcement as follows:

Masonic.—A regular communication of Ancient Landmark Lodge No. 5 will be held in Masonic Hall this evening. Work in the E. A. degree. By order of the W. M."

My lines were as follows:

"If the Masonic fraternity is permitted to lay the corner-stone of the court house, it is suggested that they be required to place in their box a history of the abduction and murder of William Morgan: also the obligations and penalties of the Masonic degrees; and to cut the obligations and penalties of the Royal Arch degree on the outside of the corner-stone."

To-day the clerk of the Pioneer Press returns it to me with the money, and says they could not print it. Possibly it would not have pleased the Masons to see that under their announcement, and in the Pioneer Press. And yet it is a well established historical fact that the Masons did murder William Morgan for writing the secrets of Masonry; and the obligations and penalties of the Masonic degrees are well known to all the world. The Pioneer Press in its report of my sermon called the secrets "damnable." I did not use that word, but they did.

And now at this very hour the Masons are charging a citizen of St. Paul with some of those secrets; they are bewildering a man with a false worship consisting of lying myths and false promises of a mock salvation. And in an act of worship they will swear him to be brutally murdered if he fails to forever conceal from us what we all know. (See "Ecce Orienti," compared with "Freemasonry Illustrated;" subject, Entered Apprentice degree.) The pulpit and the press of St. Paul can advertise and encourage that, but they are such moral cowards that they dare not allow any discussion about it wherein they would be at all implicated as against Masonry.

Surely every Christian ought to feel full of the tenderest sympathy for the poor bound Mason and Odd-fellow. Even as Christ felt for those whom he addressed, when he said, "Ye serpents, ye vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?" Since my dream, that I had joined the Freemasons, I can sympathize with them as never before, knowing now what they must experience if they ever come to repentance.

It is true that the Freemason is a sworn sinner, and that of a very dangerous kind; but it is as easy for God to forgive one pardonable sin as another, and if the Freemason will exercise repentance and break his obligation he will find the yoke of Jesus quite as easy and his burden quite as light as does any other pardoned sinner. Ministers ought to preach salvation to Masons and Odd-fellows just as freely and just as tenderly as to any other class of sinners. But there is not an English-speaking church in the city, except the Roman church, that dares to treat Freemasonry as a sin. Nor is there a newspaper, printed in the English language, in the city that dares question the goodness of the secret orders, but they will speak in praise of the secret orders. They seem to think they have nothing to fear from God and the Anti-masons; but they fear much from the secretists, where there would be nothing to fear if they were men of God.

PITH AND POINT.

NO LONGER A GRANGER.

Success to you in your grand work of opposing the "unfruitful works of darkness." I was for five years a Granger, but withdrew last November. I am convinced that secrecy is a great hindrance to the cause of religion. —John W. Claypool, Ft. Spring, W. Va.

THE SECRECY OF THE SONS OF TEMPERANCE ORDER.

In answer to J. C. Young in your last issue, I would say the whole work of the S. of T. is as much a secret as the pass-word. It is often asserted by members that there are no secrets. The same is said of the G. A. R. The Prohibition convention in this State was presided over by a prominent Masou, and many of the workers are members of secret orders. I do uot know the standing of the nominees, but can we trust them when the reins are drawn by Masons? I would like to get an expose of the Foresters; is there such a book in print?—W. E. Mace, Boston, Mass.

There is none. The Cynosure would like information from any of its readers respecting this order, or any other of the minor orders, so-called, for use in a series of descriptive articles of the different lodges.

THE TWO BONDS OF THE NEGRO.

I wish to say that I am glad to see your position toward secret socicties. I believe these and intemperance are the things that hold us down as a race more than anything else, and there is no paper in the land that is doing more good in the South than yours. There are a few of my members who belong to the lodge. I wish it was in your power to send me a copy or two each week to give to such members so that they may be able to see such action as is taken by the Baptists in Tennessee and in Mississippi. Can you do this and help the cause on here in Texas? The lodge is quite young here. I would pay for the papers for these members if I was able to do so, but am not, and if they have to pay for them they won't get them and therefore will not read them. If you can send the papers please let me know and I shall send you the names. Yours in the good cause.—J. R. McLean, Paris, Texas.

Who will help this brother? The fund for sending the Cynosure to colored pastors should have the prayers and gifts of thousands. Who has a portion of the Lord's money for this cause?

FOURTH QUARTER.

STUDIES IN THE KINGS AND PROPHETS.

LESSON II. Oct. 11, 1885.—The famine in Samaria. 2 Kings 7: 1-17.

GOLDEN TEXT.—The things which are impossible with men are possible with God. Luke 18: 27.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

COMMENTS ON THE LESSON BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. God's promises are generally fulfilled through unthought-of agencies. vs. 1–7. The courtier who met Elisha's prophecy with blasphemous unbelief has many counterparts. Men forget that God's plans are like his commandments, "exceeding broad;" and so they say, "Impossible!" when reformers prophesy the extinction of great evils like Masonry and intemperance. They forget that he has his hand on the motive-springs of human action, and can bring about the most astonishing results in the simplest and most natural way. It was true that even if the enemy raised the siege, the country foraged for miles around could never supply in twenty-four hours such incredible plenty; but the Lord did not need to work a miracle—only to send a sudden panic through the Syrian hosts. Formidable as are the hosts of evil, God has always at means at hand for their discomforture. The terrified and bewildered army left all their rich stores behind, and Elisha's words were verified—"a measure of fine flour for a shekel, and two measures of barley for a shekel." But the scoffing lord whose words of unbelief must have added terribly to the general despair was trampled under the feet of the famine-stricken crowd. His punishment was just. He had poisoned the springs of hope for the starving populace. But what shall be the doom of those who poison the fountains of heaveuly hope?—who by their sneers, open or covert, keep away starving souls from the Gospel feast. Unbelief is dangerous. Obstructionists in the path of God's divine plans must expect to be swept away in their resistless march.

2. God chooses to benefit the world through humble instruments. vs. 8–16. Says a certain writer: "The grandest revolutions in the history of the universe have been accomplished by its beggars, and, as the world thought, its fools." It is given to four outcast lepers to be the bearers of life to the perishing city. God's purposes of evil have generally been worked out by some imperial or kingly monster—a Louis XIV. or a Catherine De Medicis; while, on the other hand, when the whole race is to be regenerated and lifted up, Luther emerges from a miner's hut, the apostles from fishermen's boats, and the divine Son of God himself from a manger. The lepers did not keep the good news to themselves, but carried it at once to their famishing fellow-citizens. How much more should every man and woman saved by the blood of Jesus feel it incumbent upon them to tell others the glad tidings of great joy. It is not opportunity we need, but the heart and the will. The Christian's indifference is a greater obstacle to the conversion of the world than the scoff of the infidel.

LIGHT FROM THE WORD.

Why is it perfectly reasonable to believe that God can do all things? Prov. 21: 1; Ps. 50: 10. What must be the fate of those who try to obstruct his great plan of salvation? Luke 20: 18.

The Siege of Samaria.—Benhadad, the king of Syria, soon collected another great army and came up from Damascus, with the evident intention of subjugating the whole country. Being resistless in the field, he soon shut up the king of Israel with his army in Samaria, the capital, and besieged the city. This was the fourth time that he had attacked the king of Israel with great force (1 Kings 20: 1, 26. 22: 29–31), and the second time that he had besieged Samaria (1 Kings 20: 1.)—Todd.

"There were four leprous men." Men with the leprousy.

"At the entering in of the gate." At the gateway, separated from human society, according to the law in Lev. 13: 46; Num. 5: 3, probably in a building erected for the purpose (comp. chap. 15: 5), just as at the present day the lepers at jerusalem have their huts by the side of the Zion gate.—Keil.

"The Egyptians." From the south. The sound seemed to the Syrians to come from both directions. Rationalists have endeavored to account for it by natural causes, such as unusual sounds heard on the mountains or in the depths of the valleys, produced by winds or approaching tempests; but this comes very much to the same thing. The great wonder or miracle is in the spiritual effect produced. We might regard it as an event produced solely by physical causes, were it not for what is expressly told us in ver. 6. It was the supernatural using the natural as its means. The strangeness is in the terrible nature of its results.—Tayler Lewis.

"We do not well." Their consciences were soon aroused so that they said, "We are not doing right; for it is the duty of citizens to make known things relating to public safety."—Grotius.

How uncertain life is and its enjoyment! Honor and power cannot secure men from sudden and inglorious deaths. He whom the king leaned on, the people trod on; he who fancied himself the stay and support of the government is trampled under foot as the mire in the streets; thus hath the pride of men's glory been often stained.—Henry.

—The Hamilton County (Ohio) Prohibition convention voted in favor of open methods.

—The recent negotiations between China and Japan relating to Corea were conducted entirely in English on account of the definiteness of its terms.

—Rum and lodge governed Boston a few months ago arrested several street preachers, but did not dare to press the issue and street preaching has occurred every pleasant Sabbath since.

—Dr. Pentecost said at the late Moody convention: "Sanctification is the result of union in communion with Christ, also the hope of Christ's return. The last is the most powerful incentive to holiness, the mightiest stimulus to sanctification that we have."

—Past Grand Bourlet makes the announcement to his brethren that during the past twenty years 354,258 Odd-fellows have been suspended. Most of these poor fellows were "hung" for not being able or willing to pay their dues. We congratulate these ex-lodge men on their escape, but it is a somewhat sad reflection that they left about $20,000,000 in the lodge till.

A Wonderful Woman, A Wonderful Life, AND A Wonderful Book.

Laura S. Haviland is a quiet, gentle, unassuming Quaker woman, 76 years of age, yet vigorous, who has had a remarkable career of usefulness, and has now given to the world a remarkable history of her "Life Work" as a teacher, at an early day, of the colored refugees in Canada and in Michigan, and in other States, as a traveler down South in the guise of a "berry picker," helping out into freedom many slaves; as a nurse and preacher to the sufferers in hospitals during the war; and with Gov. St. John and Elizabeth Comstock, relieving the destitute and suffering refugees in Kansas, etc.

Her book is neither fiction nor founded on fiction, but is an interesting narration of facts of a most thrilling character, as every one will find and testify who will get and read her book, now on sale at the Cynosure office, 221 W. Madison St., Chicago, Ill. Price, cloth, $1,75; half Russia, $2.25.

AMERICAN PLATFORM.

ADOPTED AT CHICAGO, JUNE 20, 1884.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled condition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clannishuess by which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile bands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruption, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; and having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and believing the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, both inevitable and indispensable:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, believing with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; believing in the Christian marriage, and not in Mormonism; believing in the religious democracy of the New Testament, and not in the despotism of the lodge; believing, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, not in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we abhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscience by human laws and penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly believe that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike focs to human liberty and welfare. We further most firmly believe that a government without God has none but lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a mere usurpation, we regard all religions and worships invented by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as mere swindling impositions and cheats. We believe in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly believe that the bravery and blood of our soldiers have bought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will be just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised by the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon be not only echoed by their voices, but sustained by their votes.

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following, as containing a brief synopsis of the principles of our government, by which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.
2. That the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.
3. That God requires, and man needs a Sabbath.
4. We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.
5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.
6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to benefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.
7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punishmeut of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.
8. We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage.
9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be preserved inviolate, and the same equality should be extended to Indians and Chinamen.
10. That international differences should be settled by arbitration.
11. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.
12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.
13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.
14. That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.
15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

The Christian Cynosure.

Editors.

J. BLANCHARD. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1885.

So long as God, the Bible, and the Sabbath are ignored by political platforms, every election is a season of backsliding: as lynching runs down law by dispensing with it in administering justice; or as laws, never quoted in courts, are steadily becoming obsolete and running down.

Hon. S. D. Hastings's article on the analogy between the anti-slavery struggle and the anti-liquor or prohibition movement, given at Lake Bluff and in the Wisconsin Prohibitionist, is strong and convincing. We shall try and give the pith of it in the Cynosure.

The New York State Prohibition convention met in Syracuse week before last: 600 delegates were in attendance, and the evening congregation of four or five thousand, on a wet night. The votes were all harmonious. A week or two before the New York Grand Lodge of Good Templars repudiated this Prohibition party by a two-thirds vote! In the Prohibition convention, in a few minutes, four thousand dollars were raised for the cause.

John B. Finch rides two horses running in opposite directions. He is the "Grand Worthy Chief Templar of the world" whose sub-Grand Lodges repudiate the Prohibition party, of which he is chairman of the executive committee. The man who stood with his feet in two boats was drowned between them.

The Massachusetts Prohibitionists met in Worcester, Sept. 10th. The convention was earnest and harmonious. Ex-Gov. St. John gave the address and reported the convention of New York and Pennsylvania as "full of hope and promise." Thos. J. Lathrop, of Taunton and Chas. B. Knight, of Worcester were nominated for Governor and Lieut. Governor.

Woman Suffrage was warmly endorsed by both State Prohibition conventions of New York and Massachusetts. The former said:—"We hold that justice and equity alike demand that the ballot should be given to woman."

Masonry is a species of which devil-worship is the genus. Devil-worship is ancient as Eden, when Eve forsook God and followed that "old serpent which is the devil and Satan." Masonry proper is English. If Satan had not started a Protestant, Christless lodge in England (1717) he would have had nothing but old popish Templar Masonry, which sunk under the blows of Cervantes in Don Quixotte. But the devil always takes both sides; and when popish Masonry fell by Cervantes and afterward by the French Revolution, Protestant English Masonry started at the Apple-tree tavern; came to the front: crossed into France; blended with popish Chapter Masonry: chartered all lodges, and now rules the world.

Please read again Rev. R. N. Countee's letter in last week's Cynosure. That Memphis movement, small as a man's hand at first, may yet cover the whole Southern heavens. When the Helots, the Spartan slaves, rebelled, their old masters took whips for weapons and went out to fight them, and the Helots ran away. Our slaves did no such thing. They fought under Andrew Jackson and Grant like brave men. They now stand by Countee; and if he he is killed, as he may be, he will not die alone. He will be the John Brown of lodgery. Why should he not be engaged to lecture all over the South?

> Assyria, Greece, Rome, Carthage,—where are they?
> Thy waters wasted them while they were free;
> And many a tyrant since: and their decay
> Has dried up realms to deserts.—Byron's Ocean.

More than seven centuries before Christ (776) a strong runner named Chorœbus won a foot race near Mt. Olympus in Greece, whose principal peak is near 10,000 feet high, veiled in clouds and covered with snow nine months in the year. The victory of this man's legs gave date to the Olympiads. The summit of Olympus, curtained with clouds from the mists of melting snow, became the Senate-Chamber of the Olympian Jove and his Sanhedrim of gods. Those gods have melted like the mists. So the goblin mockeries and mirages of the lodge, like the misty traditions of Olympus, are shifting and vanishing as dreams. See the following from the Victoria Freemason:

Suspended.—With regret we learn that the Rough Ashlar, published at Adelaide, South Australia, has been temporarily if not permanently suspended, because the subscribers in arrears seem perfectly indifferent to their duty to pay. It is the old story repeated. What a graveyard of Masonic publications this country affords! How many papers the Freemason, of St. Louis, absorbed, and how sadly Bro. Gouley at last yielded to discouragement and disappointment and turned over his list to us for completion; The Victorian Freemason generously and fraternally champions the Rough Ashlar, and hopes as we do, "that for the credit of the Craft in South Australia it will not be recorded that, just when emerging into the full manhood by the erection of a Grand Lodge, it allowed the only Masonic paper published in the colony to die for want of support."—Voice of Masonry.

THE SWEDISH AURORA BOREALIS.

Scandinavian State-Church Lutheranism, like an old and venerable tree, has become worm-eaten by the borers of the lodge. More than fifty years ago the more pious part of the people began to gather nightly, in groups to read the Bible, and were hence called "Readers." But they prayed and preached as well. One hundred thousand of these Readers have sloughed off the old church, and the Freemasonry of its priests and bishops is a leading cause of their secession. Satan is ready with his "dead flies" to spoil all such good ointment; and the seceded Swedes, landing in this country, are being drawn into the lodges, more than those who adhered to the State Church while they were at home.

The home leaders of the Free Mission Swedes, Waldenstrom, Eckman, Fernholm and others, are strong against the lodge, but are accused of laxness in doctrine. Waldenstrom, especially, seems to be about like our late Dr. Bushnell of Hartford, who said of himself, "I do not reject the orthodox creeds. I incline, rather, to accept all that come."

Rev. L. G. Almen, one of the editors of The Steward (Skaffaran), of St. Paul, Minn., writes us of Waldenstrom: "His conception of original sin, atonement and future punishment are essential Socinianism. . . . But then there is no system in his teachings. He has been from his very beginning, and still is, continually contradicting himself. . . . And some of his followers outstrip him in error."

This is a pity. Lax doctrine and lax morals mutually re-produce each other. But the Swedish Lutheran pastors, as they become acquainted with our national anti-secret reform, the Cynosure its organ, and its secretary J. P. Stoddard, are opening their pulpits to him; and these Swedes seem sent of God to snatch our country from the jaws of the secret lodge system.

The now sainted Dr. Milton Badger, long secretary of the American Home Missionary Society, volunteered to send anti-secret literature to all the home missionaries under its employ. We are in hopes Secretary Barrows of that noble society will do the same; and if so, the vicious non-committalism of Mr. Montgomery may be counteracted, and the Free Mission Swedes kept from contamination by the Freemasonry which has crept into and controls Congregational churches and associations.

POPERY AND MASONRY.

The Holy Catholic church existed some five centuries before there was any popery or papacy. Rome pagan is described by picture and pantomime as the seven-headed, ten-horned beast rising out of the sea, and on his heads the name of blasphemy. Rev. 13: 1. This beast or movement had power "to make war with the saints and overcome them," also "power over all kindred tongues and nations."

The second or lamb-dragon beast, is popery. This second beast moved "them that dwell on the earth," men promiscuously taken; not Christians, but men (such as now make up a lodge), to make an image of the first beast, viz., the secret lodge system, which is a copy of the secret Roman empire; a fluctuating, insubstantial shadow and likeness of the universal, secret, Roman empire; yet, shadow though it be, having power to kill those who would not worship it, and prevent their success in business. Rev. 13: 15, 17.

But is Masonry the child of popery?

Yes. The Knight Templar was received to that old crusading order "in the name of God, Mary, St. Peter and the Pope." (See Mackey's Lex., p. 263.) In 1128 the knights received a rule from the pope, to which Pope Eugenius "afterwards added a red cross as a symbol of martyrdom." (Mack. Lex. p. 259,) and Mackey quotes and endorses Lawrie, who says, "We know that the Knight Templars not only possessed the mysteries but performed the ceremonies and inculcated the duties of Freemasons." (p. 267.) This fully establishes the popish origin of the lodge, and fulfills the prophecy of Revelation that papal Rome suggested and pagan Rome made it. Popery itself is baptized paganism.

"Then does not Masonry recognize Christ?"

No. The Knight Templars' Christ is a false, fighting, counterfeit Christ; that is, Satan simulating Christ. They drink from a human skull, a cup of devils, and worship devils.

What relation has the Apple-tree tavern, Blue-lodge Masonry to Templar Masonry? It completed it. Templar Masonry was made up of churchmen; the Blue lodge, formed in 1717, was formed by "them that dwell on the earth," the promiscuous crowd which make up a modern lodge. English Masonry formed at the Apple-tree tavern (1717,) in the leading Protestant country, left out Christ altogether; then went across with the Stuarts into France, the leading Roman Catholic country, and there joined itself to chapter or priest-Masonry, a chapter being a dean and his clergy; and thus combined the two beasts in their image, and so fulfills literally the prophecy of Rev. 13: an image of a secret universal empire made up of paganism, by popish priests. And as the Apple-tree tavern Christless lodge then chartered all the rest, we have an exact fulfillment of the Revelation: a one harmonious image of Romish despotism and superstition, in a modern lodge made up of churchmen and worldlings, a universal false religion of which Satan is the god. No picture ever more perfectly conformed to its original, than the secret lodge system to the symbols in Rev. 13, or rather than the "image of the beast" conforms to and depicts the present secret lodge system. Paganism and popery, one in nature, one in prophecy, and one in their image, the lodge, will be one in the field of Armageddon in the battle-day of God which is to decide which shall have the worship of this earth, Satan or Christ. "And if any man worship the beast and his image and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand, the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation; and he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels and in the presence of the Lamb." Rev. 14: 9, 10.

THE SECRET EMPIRE.

The frequent calls for information respecting the history, membership, obligations, etc., of some of the numerous secret orders has led the editors to begin, with the new volume, one of the most difficult tasks they have ever set for themselves, namely, a sketch of all the lodges that comprise the Secret Empire, and are continually adding to its numerical strength. In these sketches we hope to include all the attainable facts which can be of value to our readers and lecturers. In this effort we shall hope to enlist every reader who may learn of any facts that can be made valuable in this department. Do not delay to communicate at once with your editors respecting such facts, and give the reform the benefit of them.

As Freemasonry, though ante-dated by several European societies, is with us the head and center of secretism, we have selected the dispassionate, careful, and clearly written article in Chamber's Encyclopedia, as likely to be received as of good authority and giving a very intelligible account of the transition from operative to speculative Masonry. Next week this subject will be continued with further historical statements and a curious extract from an old Masonic chronology.

—Attention is called to the notice of the North, Central, and South American Exposition soon to open in New Orleans and continue for a period of five months. The management have happily named the opening day, November 10th, "American Peace Day," and other special days will be celebrated during the exhibition, as, Press, Bankers, College, Congressional, Railway, and Electrical Congress, etc., but the lodges get no recognition this year as last. They contribute nothing to the strength or purity or nobility of the nation; what recognition do they deserve?

—The Cynosure was honored by a call from Prof. J. A. Edgren, whose efforts for a through and Scriptural education of young Swedish Baptist ministers have been remarkably blessed of God and enforced respect from men, even those who oppose him in the name of Masonry. His institution, now being well founded at Stromsberg, Nebraska, is succeeding most hopefully, having secured an able financial agent in Rev. Mr. Orgren. Their work has been one of faith, financially, but God has not failed to honor their trust in his promises. The institution stands alone, probably, among Baptist colleges and seminaries, in teaching the dangers to church and society from the secret orders.

—A number of good speakers are expected by the New Hampshire friends at their meeting in East Rochester, October 20th to 22nd. Among them are H. L. Hastings and Rev. David McFall of Boston, Elder Isaac Hyatt of Gilford Village, and Rev. H. F. Wood of Dover. An invitation is sent to Secretary Stoddard to be present also.

—Bro. J. W. Wood of Baraboo and Rev. W. W. Ames of Menomouie, president and secretary of the Wisconsin State Association, both approve the appointment of the State convention made by Bro. Bancroft, the State agent. It will be held at Waukesha, November 17th to 19th, and meantime there is opportunity to work up a strong meeting.

—Bro. Stoddard was much encouraged by the Genoa meetings which aroused much interest and could have been profitably continued through the week had his time permitted. The whole region round about seems to be open to lectures. Three seceded Masons gave their names as having left the lodge. They are Henry Holvoy, Alexander Ross, and Alvaro Crocker.

PERSONAL MENTION.

—Pres. L. N. Stratton of Wheaton Seminary is visiting a number of the State conferences of the Wesleyan church during the present month. The Seminary opens early in October.

—Elder D. P. Rathbun is removing his family to Bath, New York. His household goods have already been shipped.

—The wife of Rev. George Richey of Pataskala, O., formerly lecturer for the State Association, died recently. She was a faithful, devoted and active Christian, whose works do follow her on to heaven.

—Bro. Bancroft, the Wisconsiu agent, has been too unwell of late to prosecute his work. He hopes to recover in time to do some efficient work in preparation for the State meeting at Waukesha, Nov. 17th, 18th and 19th.

—Benjamin Ulsh, our long-time and faithful Indiana friend, has temporarily removed to Bowie, Montague county, Texas, on account of the ill health of his family. He will find a field ready for reform work there, as in the North.

—A note from Dr. Cook, of Indiana, brings the sad news of the death of three long and well-known friends of our reform: Absalom Ballard of Eagletown, John Bowman of Albion, and Benjamin Wallick of Peru, Indiana. Bro. John Roberts, living near Westfield, is also reported very sick. Thus pass from earthly toils and warfare one by one those whose faithful service will receive the "Well done" of their Lord.

—Bro. T. M. Wood, photographer, of Middletown, Lake county, California, sends us a unique cabinet picture, being a photograph of the Cynosure print of the old Canandaigua jail with a part of the letter press accompanying it. Bro. Wood is a strong and working temperance man as well as Anti-mason. His lectures against the saloon are commended by the California press in very flattering terms.

—Bro. R. A. Cullor of Unionville, Missouri, has experienced heavy trials during the past year. His son shot a man in self-defense after loug and grievous provocation. The lodgeites, whose wrath at the father for his earnest opposition of the orders is unspeakable, secured at first a sentence of forty years in the penitentiary against the young man. But a new trial was secured and the jury came near to a disagreement, but fiually settled on a sentence of ten years. Bro. Cullor is satisfied that the lodge manipulators have secured this heavy sentence. The legal expenses have been so great that he has been reduced almost to penury, having to give up his farm to meet them. He truly deserves the sympathy and prayers of all our reformer brethren, and, if any can afford it, substantial aid as well.

—Another case of Masonic persecution is that of Bro. S. S. Palmer, formerly pastor of the Congregatioual church at Mancelona, Mich., but now of Buffalo. Ever since he seceded from Freemasonry in Salamanca, New York, through his seminary course at Oberlin, and his succeeding labors as pastor and in business the lodge has not ceased to follow him. Lately at Arcade, New York, his house was beset, and two adopted children spirited away. Occasion was made for the trouble by a disagreement with his landlord. A final arbitration gave him, however, over $300, which is an evidence of the goodness of his cause. He has at times felt almost desperate under the malicious persecutions of the lodge, but has been able to pray God's mercy upon these enemies.

VACATION RAMBLES.

At four o'clock in the morning six of us in number, behind a fine team, started for a day's enjoyment among the Catskills. A brisk drive of twelve or fourteen miles over a hilly and stony road, interrupted by a breakfast for man and beast by the roadside, brought us, about nine o'clock, to the foot of the mountains. Up a finely-graded turnpike with stones and trees in wild confusion on either hand, piled far above us on one side, and on the other extending far below, with the music of a babbling brook or the roar of an occasional waterfall at the bottom, so we climbed to the "Rip Van Winkle" House and "Rip Van Winkle Hollow." Here we crossed and parted company with the stream whose melodious voice had thus far beguiled our ascent. Upward we climbed, cheered by an occasional glimpse through the trees of the beautiful prospect below us, spread out to the Hudson river and far beyond, and a constant prospect of the rocks piled in wild confusion and the tangled forest reaching hundreds and even thousands of feet above us.

In due time we reached the valley far above in which is Beach's Mountain House, which, although a plain wooden structure large enough to accommodate 700 guests, was till recently the most aristocratic summer resort in these mountains. Beautiful for situation, it occupies a valley which, coming up in its rear, contains two beautiful little lakes a few rods below the house, and suddenly breaks off in front of it by a precipice hundreds of feet in height and an abrupt descent to the foot of the mountain. On either side are rugged mountain summits 500 feet high.

Some few years ago a gentleman from Philadelphia was stopping at this hotel. He had a sick child that wanted cooked chicken in the night. The landlord declined to furnish the dish at so unseasonable an hour, and told the father, who complained of this, that he had better build a boarding-house of his own. He said that was just what he was thinking of doing, and the next moruing he went and selected a site on the summit of the mountain south, just south of and near to the lower lake. He purchased several thousand acres of the wild mountain scenery around, which he calls the Kaaterskill Park aud which he has threaded to the most interesting natural scenery with rugged footpaths or beautiful, costly mountain roads. Up into the heart of this wild mountain retreat a narrow-gauge railroad has crept, and a picturesque little depot is nestled beside the lower lake, which has been largely increased in size by a heavy stone dam aud bridge built across its outlet.

From hence the stroug aud easy carriages made expressly for its use, from the Kaaterskill House, by a short and exceedingly beautiful drive, land passengers with heavy purses upon the very summit of the mountain at the door of as fine a hotel as can be found iu the world, with all modern improvements, pure water, gas, separate bath-rooms and closets in a hundred rooms, a room for lectures and concerts 200 feet long—everything, in short, that a summer community of uabobs 1,200 in number can even imagine that their wants require. Instead of the whilom weary and toilsome journey from Catskill seven or eight miles to the mountain, aud then a rugged climb to its summit, which all passengers and supplies and the very material to build this extensive house and its stables for over 100 horses and its carriage houses, had to make, a short and easy trip now suffices for all.

No cyclops picked off the top of this mountain summit of solid rock, but giant powder and Paddy's pick have made here a gently slopiug and now finely-shaven lawn of several acres, beautifully adorued with beds of flowers, around this magnificent sporting-place of the would-be aristocracy of the world, at an expense, including the cost of the buildings, of over $4,000,000. Here, 3,000 feet above the level of the water in the Hudson, which lies in plain sight for over sixty miles, on the hot day of our visit the parlor grates contained heaps of burning coals that were evidently required for comfort in the morning and evening.

The view of the country below is indeed grand and wonderful. The fields of grass, and yellow grain and waving corn look like squares on a vast checker-board, iuterspersed irregularly among which are patches and strips of green, which seen from the waters of the Hudson below are forest-covered hill-tops, in some cases several hundred feet high. Over the tops of these is seen like a continuous ribbon of silver the waters of the river, far beyond which and skirting this immense apparent plain appear the Adirondack, Green and Hoosac mountains and the Berkshire hills, in almost as many different States.

Taking a last glance at this lovely panorama after a day of unalloyed pleasure, spent amid Nature's wildest, most romantic scenery, we turned our faces homeward, and at ten o'clock P. M. sought our resting-places, to dream, perchance, of Hendrick Hudson and his weird revelers amid the awful solitudes of the Catskills. O. F. Lumry.

By-ways and Bird Notes. By Maurice Thompson, author of "Songs of Fair Weather," etc. Price, 75c. John B. Alden, publisher, New York.

This beautiful little volume, published by that enterprising friend of all lovers of good literature, John B. Alden, is one of those pleasing and exquisitely wrought children of fact and fancy which ought to be in the hands of every lover of nature. The perusal of its pages wraps one in that dreamy and pleasing Indian summer feeling which used to possess us whenever we read those charming prose poems of Thoreau, which were so vividly and fancifully real as to lull us into a momeutary belief that we were dancing with the young bears on the frost-shaveu tops of the cedars on Mt. Katahdin or really capturing nine-pound trout for ourselves, though we had never seen a real live one and had never angled for anything more gamey than small and not very hungry mud pout.

While our author is so charmingly imaginative he never fails to weave in with his imagery the clever and accurate descriptions of the life, habits and appearence of our feathered friends. Indeed his bits of information concerning them are choice, new and accurate. Certainly our young friends could not find a more pleasing introduction to the charming study of "Bird-Life" than in reading aloud to their elder frieuds "A Red-Headed Family," "Cuckoo Notes," "In a Palace of Reeds," "Browsing and Nibbling," and that beautiful description of "a belted kingfisher," in "The Threshold of the Gods." Every paper is teeming with the odor and incense of the woods and vocal with the songs of their feathered denizens. The volume has charms alike for the old and the young. To the one class it will recall the scenes and dreams of the times when the earth to them was new and full of melody and hilarious joy. To the other class it will be a strong inspiration to become acquainted with the objects about them, and lead them out and up towards the source of all true happiness, "Our adorable God." R. T. M.

We are in receipt of the twelfth and last number of "German Simplified," edited and published by A. Knoflach, New York. Intended, as it is, for self-instruction, the work has its merits, and will doubtless very much assist the studeut. It would, however, be the height of folly for any one to attempt by self-instruction to master the German language. To do that requires the aid, at least for a season, of a teacher speaking the language. If it be impossible to obtain such aid, "German Simplified," will probably better than most text books assist in acquiring a very rudimentary kuowledge of the language.

W. Scott, Publisher, London, has just brought out a selection of the poems of the marvellous boy-poet, Chatterton, who perished three months before reaching his eighteenth year. To this edition is prefixed a very interesting biography of Chattertou. The latter seems to have beeu treated by Walpole with the tyrannous arrogance which rude-minded men in high places usually show to struggliug genius. Walpole is even said to have been indirectly the cause of the poor boy's early death. It was of this unfortunate that Coleridge said: "Had he lived he would have been as far above Shakespeare as Shakespeare is above me."

NEW HAMPSHIRE—NOTICE.

The Ninth Annual Meeting of the New Hampshire Christian Association will be held in the Advent church at East Rochester, Oct. 20, 21, and 22, commencing Tuesday evening and closing Thursday evening. Earnest, honest Christian men will be engaged to speak. Let this meeting be a grand rally for the Lord and his truth. Let constant prayer be offered that the Holy Spirit may guide our deliberations and inspire every speaker.

A. H. Lamprey, President,

S. C. Kimball, Secretary.

Jeffersou Davis, the ex confederate leader, comes out of his old-age retirement at Beauvoir. Miss., to deny in the New York Herald, a story told by a Lieut. Isrigg, concerning his attempting to escape in female attire when surrounded by U. S. cavalry in 1865. This is not the first time Davis has endeavored to contradict this story. Will our old singer friend, George W. Clark, tell us what he kuows of the matter?

The Home.

A PRAYER.

Oh, birds that sing such thankful psalms,
  Rebuking human fretting,
Teach us your secret of content,
  Your science of forgetting.
For every life must have its ills—
  You, too, have times of sorrow—
Teach us, like you, to lay them by
  And sing again to-morrow;
For gems of blackest jet may rest
  Within a golden setting,
And he is wise who understands
  The science of forgetting.

Oh, palms that bow before the gale
  Until its peaceful ending,
Teach us your yielding, linked with strength,
  Your graceful art of bending:
For every tree must meet the storm,
  Each heart encounter sorrow;
Teach us, like you, to bow, that we
  May stand erect to-morrow;
For there is strength in humble grace—
  Its wise disciples shielding—
And he is strong who understands
  The happy art of yielding.

Oh, brook, which laughs all night, all day,
  With voice of sweet seduction,
Teach us your art of laughing more
  At every new obstruction;
For every life has eddies deep
  And rapids fiercely dashing,
Sometimes through gloomy caverns forced,
  Sometimes in sunlight flashing;
Yet there is wisdom in your way,
  Your laughing waves and whimples:
Teach us your gospel built of smiles,
  The secret of your dimples.

Oh, oaks, that stand in forest ranks,
  Tall strong, erect, and sightly,
Your branches arched in noblest grace,
  Your leaflets laughing lightly:
Teach us your firm and quiet strength,
  Your secret of extraction
From slimy darkness in the soil
  The grace of life and action;
For they are rich who understand
  The secret of combining
The good deep hidden in the earth
  With that where suns are shining.

Oh, myriad forms of earth and air,
  Of lake, and sea, and river,
Which make our landscapes glad and fair
  To glorify the Giver.
Teach us to learn the lessons hid
  In each familiar feature,
The mystery which so perfects
  Each low or lofty creature;
For God is good, and life is sweet,
  While suns are brightly shining,
To glad the glooms and thus rebuke
  Our follies of repining.

Each night is followed by its day,
  Each storm by fairer weather,
While all the works of nature sing
  Their psalms of joy together,
Then learn, O heart, their songs of hope!
  Cease, soul, thy thankless sorrow;
For though the clouds be dark to-day,
  The sun shall shine to-morrow;
Learn well, from bird and tree and rill,
  The sins of dark resentment;
And know the greatest gift of God
  Is faith and sweet contentment.

THE SECOND COMING OF CHRIST.

The above subject is stated 318 times in the 260 chapters of the New Testament, or once every twenty-five verses. This shows how important the New Testament writers thought the return of Christ to be, and its introduction into almost every discourse and on a great variety of themes shows how the early teachers of Christianity enjoyed it, without "wearing out the saints of the Most High," or considering it a threadbare subject. There is scarcely an allusion to this coming which is not eminently practical. "If we believe that Jesus died and rose again," then we are ready to receive the other very important addition, that they "that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him."

In Paul's earliest written epistle we should naturally expect him to lay a firm foundation in doctrine and practice for the faith or the church. He says of conversion (1 Thess. 1: 9, 10), "Ye turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God and to wait for his Son from heaven." Our Saviour says, "What shall it profit a man?" then follows a profound question in regard to the soul's value. "For the Son of Man shall come." We often hear of sleepy professors (Christians?). Why should they not awake? Is it not high time to awake out of sleep? Certainly; but will they? While the Bridegroom tarried they all slumbered. What is the cause of this mental and moral stupor? When the Son of Man shall come in his glory, every disciple will be truly awake, for he is our life, and it is hid "in him." "Watch ye, therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour when the Son of Man cometh." How will he come? "As ye (the disciples) have seen him go into heaven"—in the body, in the presence of his disciples, in clouds (it may be of witnesses), from the Mount of Olives. Where will he come? "His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives which is before Jerusalem on the east" (Zach. 14: 4).

Dear brethren, are you "looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing?" "See that ye come behind in no gift, waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." Shall we pray for it? Yes; John did. "Come, Lord Jesus." The crown of righteousness is to be given "in that day." Then he will be glorified "in his saints." "Our conversation is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Saviour." "Sanctify you wholly," Paul prays unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. Are you laboring under a great "trial" of faith? Ye may be found unto praise and power and glory. "Be patient, therefore, unto the coming of the Lord. "Beloved, now are ye the sons of God," but when he shall appear we shall be like him. Seeing ye look for such things, be patient. The faithful pastor to his flock may say, "What is our hope or joy or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming?" Then present faith will be sight; Simeon took him up in his arms; Mary sat at his feet; Martha served him; Lazarus was his table companion; The apostles all walked with him, and John leaned on his breast. But, O blessed Jesus, "what will it be to be there?"—Rev. M. W. Spencer, in the Morning Star.

WHAT IS RELIGION?

A negro congregation has recently ejected from its pulpit the pastor because, in his preaching, he failed to produce in the souls of his hearers "a happy-fying effect." The colored church had a quaint way of stating their trouble, but that they fairly hit it there can be no doubt. This "happy-fying effect" is, after all, only a very apt and correct way of expressing the idea which gropes in the minds of not a few white congregations in reference to the character and ability of their ministers. To such the preacher is successful if, by his sermons and his personal address, he makes those who hear and meet him to feel happy. Religion, according to this estimate, is a state of spiritual enjoyment—an easy, pleasurable, self-satisfied feeling. A sermon is good that lifts the hearer into a glow of wonder, or quietly lets him down into a blissful restfulness. So the Reverend Cream Cheese is "a love of a preacher" because, in his prayers and discourses, he excites or lulls the nerves of his congregation, and, by his dainty ways at the "church sociables," wins the hearts of the "young people." Religion, being in its inmost nature "happy-fying," means in the pulpit an immaculately-fitting coat, middle-parted hair, considerable poetry, a musical flow of beautiful words; and in the church orange suppers, neck tie parties, chocolate ice-cream soirees and sacred footlight performances, with side-shows where gambling is called "guessing." A modern church is fully equipped only as it has a silk-stockinged romancer in the pulpit, a full-fledged angel of a soprano in the choir, and a kitchen stove in the basement—all of which most appropriately go with this idea that religion is "happy-fying." But somehow any reading of Scripture jars like a thunder-roll amidst these "divine services." Law and prophecy, psalm and Gospel, thrust hard against these "good-time" ideas of religion. Prohibition and injunction, "burdens," "woes" innumerable, obligation, duty, "the cross," "self-denial," "service unwearied," "loss of right hands," "loss of right eyes," "resisting unto blood," "faithful unto death"—these strong, cutting words meet one everywhere in New and Old Testament until religion begins to be less and less a "happy-fying" thing, and more and more a serious, urgent, never-ending work. If religion is to be pleased, and to be interested, and to have a good time, and to be happy, then let the high-priced choir sing on their operatic snatches. Let the low-pumped preacher syllable forth his "airy nothings." Let the kitchen stove glow, and the footlights flash, and pink tea-parties "ne'er break up." But if religion means the "working out with fear and trembling of the soul's salvation," and the living and the dying with Christ for the world's redemption, then it is time for a singing that shall be for God's praise, and a preaching that shall condemn and convict and save, and a church which shall be fulfilling the mission of its Founder in preaching the Gospel to every creature.—Vermont Chronicle.

THE PURE IN HEART.

Some are greatly perplexed to understand how the blood of Christ can cleanse the heart from sin—how we can wash our robes ad make them white in the blood of the Lamb. The word blood, in this connection, refers to the atonement that Christ made for sin, and this is the procuring cause of our salvation; and this great price of the blood of the everlasting covenant secured for us "the gift of the Holy Ghost." So we are made pure by the incoming of the Holy Ghost, through the merits and death of the Lord Jesus Christ. The fulness of the Holy Ghost is entire satisfaction.

Let us always remember that when the Holy Ghost comes into the soul, he comes to rule that soul. He will not take full possession until there is an absolute surrender to his sway. Some say, "I submitted when I was converted." Yes, you did; but it was the submission of a rebel laying down his weapons of rebellion. Now you must submit yourself as a loyal man, who is willing to lay down his life for his country. At conversion you gave all your bad things to God; after you are converted you give all your good things. Yea, you give him all—"a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service."

Some years ago a rich man was on his knees at a national camp-meeting, seeking for heart purity, but there was a conflict going on in his mind. In the midst of his praying he took out his pocket-book and pencil and began to make an estimate of how much he could give to God without embarrassing his business. He concluded that he could give $5,000 and decided to do so, and soon the joy of heaven welled up in his heart. That $5,000 started our Mexican mission. He went home and related this experience to his wife, and she was under conviction for holiness, but the blessing lingered, and she hardly knew why. At last her husband said, "I have been making a calculation and find that the jewels you wear, if sold, would sustain a missionary in China for eighteen years, and now will you give them up for Christ's sake?"

When Miss Frances Ridley Havergal was seeking purity of heart she had about fifty jewels that had been given to her. She felt that Jesus must have them, so she sent them, all except a plain pin and watch-chain which she kept for use, to the missionary society.

So must we all yield our whole being and substance to God, saying—

"Take my soul and body's powers,
  Take my memory, mind and will,
All my goods and all my hours,
  All I know and all I feel,
All I think, or speak or do,
  Take my heart and make it new.'

HOW IT IS DONE.

I remember a man who had been a Christian for two years, but who was bemoaning his hard and sinful heart. I said to him one day: "Did you ever know a sinner who had not a hard heart?"

"No," he said, "but mine is getting no better."

I arose and closed all the shutter, and made the room quite dark.

"Why do you do that?" he asked.

"I want to teach you how to drive away the darkness," I said; so I handed him a long broom and a duster. "Now I want you to sweep out the darkness."

"I can't," he said.

"Can't you if you try very hard? Will no amount of physical force do it?"

"Certainly not," he said.

Then I opened the shutters, and the room was beatifully illuminated. "So you see that, if you want the darkness and dreadings of your heart to be dispelled, it is not by any amount of effort of your own, but by letting in the light of the Sun of Righteousness. But now that we have such a beautiful light in the room, we may close the shutters again; we shall want no more, I suppose, for a month," I said.

"What do you mean?"

"I mean that we are not to expect to have a stock of grace laid up, on which we may draw; but that, if we would continue in the light, we must keep looking up to the Sun, and receiving his blessed rays into our souls."—Selected.

MOTHER'S ROOM.

I'm awfully sorry for poor Jack Roe;
He's the boy that lives with his aunt, you know,
And he says his house is filled with gloom
Beeause it has got no "mother's room."
I tell you what, it is fine enough
To talk of "boudoirs" and such fancy stuff,
But the room of rooms that seems best to me,
The room where I'd always rather be,
Is mother's room, where a fellow ean rest,
And talk of things his heart loves best.

What if I do get dirt about,
And sometimes startle my aunt with a shout;
It is mother's room, and if she don't mind
To the hints of others I'm always blind.
Maybe I lose my things—what then?
In my mother's room I find them again.
And I've never denied that I litter the floor
With marbles and tops and many things more,
But I tell you, for boys with a tired head,
It's jolly to rest it on mother's bed.

Now, poor Jack Roe, when he visits me,
I take him to mother's room, you see,
Beeause it's the nicest plaee to go
When a fellow's spirits are getting low.
And mother she's always kind and sweet,
And there's always a smile poor Jaek to greet.
And somehow the sunbeams seem to glow
More brightly in mother's room, I know,
Than anywhere else; and you'll never find gloom
Or any old shadow in mother's room.

BABIES IN SCANDINAVIA.

The peasants like grand names for their little ones, such as Adolph, Adricin, Gotfried, Gustavus, for boys; and Josephina, Thora, Ingeborg, for girls; and if they have no name prepared, they seek one in the almanac for the particular day of baby's birth. It is baptized the next Sunday and taken to church by the god-mother, who provides the christening garments, which are often trimmed with colored bows, while the infant has beads round its neck and wears a cap with very little border. The clergyman holds it well over the font and pours water over the back of the head three times, then wipes with a towel. As the baby is swathed in six-inch-wide bandages so that it cannot move its legs and sometimes not even its arms, it is obliged to lie very passive during this ceremonial. The peasants have their reasons for this swathing, the first of which is that they think it makes the limbs grow straight; the second, that it turns baby into a compact bundle to carry. When swathed thus, infants have been said to resemble the tail of a lobster, or even its whole body. In the north they are often hung from a long, springy pole stuck in the wall, to be out of the way; and, being by nature quiet, they are supposed not to mind it. Their cradles, which are very primitive, are also frequently suspended by a spiral spring from the roof, which must be more comfortable than the pole. Both in Swedish and Norwegian Lapland people take these "swaddlings" to church. But instead of carrying them into church they make a hole in the snow outside in the churchyard and bury them in it, leaving a small aperture for breathing purposes. The babies are kept splendidly warm, while their friends within the sacred building have their beards frozen to their fur coats by the freezing of their own breaths. As soon as a peasant boy can walk, he is put into trousers, buttoned outside his jacket; and these are so baggy behind that it is often amusing to see him. This bagginess is frequently due to the fact that the trousers originally belonged to his father, and were cut off at the legs and simply drawn round the boy's waist without reducing their size. Add to this that the feet are shod either with little jack-boots or wooden shoes, and we have a strange picture. Their stockings either have leather heels or no heels at all, so that the mother is spared the trouble of mending them. Neither has she much labor with their heads, the hair of which is cropped as close as a convict's. The girls also wear wooden shoes, but they have gingham kerchiefs or caps on their heads, frocks down to their heels, and quaint pinafores.—The Little Folks' Magazine.

BETTER THAN MONEY.

There was once a poor man, a linen-weaver, who sat every day, from earliest dawn, in his workshop, hard at work; and as he was one who put his trust in God, to pass away the time he would sing many a hymn or innocent song, as he felt inclined. And he had so clear and strong a voice that the neighbors required no alarm to wake them in the morning.

But this greatly annoyed a rich merchant who lived near him; for he never could sleep before midnight, owing to his anxious thoughts about his money, and very early in the morning he was awaked by this noisy, vexatious sing-song of his neighbor, the weaver.

He reflected how he could put an end to this annoyanee. He could not forbid it; for singing, like praying and working, is the right of every man in his own house, with which no one can interfere. He must use other means, then.

He sent for the workman, and asked him at what value he estimated his singing. The workman replied that he thought it was certainly worth a day's wages, as it made the day's work so easy to him.

The merehant inquired how much that was. The man replied, and it was certainly not a large sum which he named.

Then the merchant said he would pay him a month's wages in advance, not for the singing, indeed, but that he should henceforth sing no more, but keep a strict silence. And he laid down the money before him.

The weaver thought to himself it could not be easier earned; so he took the money and promised that he would be as still as a mouse in his workshop.

When he got home with his money he counted it out full of joy; and they were all good new coins—more money than he had ever possessed at once in his life before. In the evening, before he went to sleep, he gazed at his treasure for nearly an hour; and at night he put it under his pillow, lest a thief should steal any of it. At midnight he still had it in his head, and thought about what he should do with it. And in the morning when he arose it seemed to weigh down all his limbs like lead—his head was heavy with lying awake so anxiously, his hands were heavy and lazy, and refused their usual serviee.

Ah, he dared not sing!

Time passed away slowly and tediously, so that he could scarcely endure the day. Meanwhile he had been thinking the matter over and had come to a conclusion, for the man who stood at eight that evening in the merchant's office was the weaver.

"Sir, with your permission," he said, "here you have your money back again; it is an evil spirit which does not allow me to sleep quietly."

And before the merchant could say a word in reply, the weaver was already outside the door, and singing, with a clear, full voice,

A fresh and merry heart
Is worth more than money or wealth,

TEMPERANCE.

A BUGLE NOTE FOR PROHIBITION.

REPORT OF THE SUSQUEHANNA FREE METHODIST CONFERENCE ON TEMPERANCE.

There are many forms of intemperance. Each form is a root which, under favorable conditions, produces the full grown tree, with all its poisonous roots, branches and deadly fruits. Intemperance is a deadly crime. It is a deadly foe to the home, the church and the state. It is founded in avarice on the part of the rumseller, and in selfish ambition on the part of the bad politician, and an unholy appetite on the part of the drunkard. The chief obstacles to the temperance reform, are the ignorance and indifference of the churches and the bad politicians who control political parties in the interest of the rum power; and who prevent the people from voting directly on the question of prohibition.

The four great corner-stones in this wholesale crime, are:

1st. Pat behind the bar.

2d. The officials who grant licenses and should execute the laws.

3d. The legislators who make the laws.

4th. Tne voters who make the legislators.

In our judgment the attempt to suppress the crime of intemperance merely by moral suasion or good advice, while at the same time the State prohibits by law the crimes it occasions, and legalizes the crime of intemperance and tempts to drunkenness by the bloody license system, is the most consummate folly. License either high priced or low priced, perpetuates and increases the liquor traffic. Eor the suppression of intemperanee, regulation and taxation is worse than useless. We need not only moral suasion in the home, the school, from the pulpit and the press, but we need most of all State and National constitutional prohibition.

And this can only be had when a party becomes dominant, whose political platform clearly advocates prohibition, and whose nominees for office are genuprohibitionists. Only such a party will execute prohibitory laws.

Neither of the two great political parties favor emperance, much less national prohibition. The Republiean party claims to be the party of great moral ideas—a temperance rum pary. The Democratie party claims to be a rum party. The settled policy of both these parties has been, is, and must be license or legalized poisoning. Both of these parties are so owned and controlled by the rum power that they cannot reform themselves because reformation would be self-destruction. To vote with either of these national parties is to vote for license. To claim otherwise is absurd, because license and prohibition are exact opposites, and it is absolutely impossible to vote a prohibition license ticket. Not to vote for prohibition is to vote for license.

Those who vote with license parties vote for the drunkenness, the puperism, the ghastly crimes and the endless damnation justly chargeable to the license system. They are partners with rumsellers and drunkards, and therefore partakers of their sins.

If the church, the world's lighthouse, is darkness on this subject, if she talks temperance and votes license, if she votes with wicked parties for ungodly men, while she waits for prohibition to become popular, millions of souls will be shipwrecked and lost forever through her neglect, and their blood will God require at her hands.

As a denomination we are radical and progressive on the temperance question. Our book of discipline prohibits the use of fermented wines at the sacrament, alcoholic beverages, tobacco and opium, for the gratification of depraved appetites; it also prohibits the production, manufacture and sale of tobacco, and instructs members to vote only for prohibitionists.

In our judgment we would be more consistent and more effieient in promoting temperance—

1. If our discipline was more strictly enforced in reference to picking hops, selling tobacco, etc.

2. If the common use of tobacco was prohibited and regarded only as a mode of producing disease, and in no case a medicine.

3. If our members were prohibited from renting their property for the promotion of any form of intemperance.

4. If our membership more fully understood that they cannot promote the welfare of the state, the church, or the glory of God, while they vote for any political party whose platform is silent on the subject of prohibition.

Resolved, That we, as a conference, will do all in our power to educate the people in favor of Gospel temperance and prohibition.

Resolved, That we will vote with no political party that ignores, or attempts to be neutral on the subject of prohibition.

Resolved, That we will support no political party whose nominees for office are not genuine prohibitionists, and whose party platform does not distinctly and fully advoeate State and National prohibition.

Resolved, That it is the sense of this conference at the present that we ought earnestly to support either the American party or the national Prohibition party.

A TEMPERANCE CENTENNIAL.

Botson, Mass., Sept. 21—A temperance centennial conference of two days' duration was begun today at Tremont Temple. The occasion was in commemoration of what is popularly known as the temperance reform in this country, as it was in 1775 that Dr. Rush published his essay on "The effects of Ardent Spirits on the Human Mind and Body." The conference is under the auspices of the Massachusetts Total Abstinence Society, and during the day addresses were made by the Rev. Daniel Dorchester, D. D., the Rev. J. W. Chickering, D. D., Mrs. J. Ellen Foster, and the Rev. A. A. Miner. At the evening session the speakers were the Rev. A. Lamson, and Mrs. Mary A. Livermore.

WHAT BEER IS DOING.

At the brewers' congress, twenty-five years ago, but thirty-four firms were represented. At the last one, the records show an organization of 739 members, made up from thirty-six States, and representing 3,000 breweries, which produce 16,000,000 of the 18,000,000 barrels of beer annually brewed in the United States. There are $250,000,000 invested in this business, and it requires to labor of 500,000 men. This number, with the 30,000 makers and sellers of distilled spirits, make up a pretty fair political party, and sound thinking men and practical Christian men have come to the conclusion that there should be an anti-brewers party, which is once and forever opposed to the manufacture and sale of that poison which is rapidly making our American homes wretched. Yet, on account of such a position, these God-fearing men and women are called fanatical. What a blessed thought it is that there is Another who is to pronounee the final verdict on the question.

The Churches.

—Rev. A. W. Hall, secretary of the Iowa State Association, is visiting the Wesleyan conferences as missionary agent of the denomination. He is endeavoring to make efficient the plan of raising an average of $1.00 per member.

—The evangelistic meetings which were begun July 1, at Chicago Avenue Church, have been held every evening since, and are still in progress, with increasing interest. The conduct of the meetings has been in the hands of well-known evangelists but last week the preaching was by Pres. C. A. Blanchard, Rev. Drs. Henson of the First Baptist, Little of the New England Congregational and Lawrence of the Second Baptist churches.

—Gospel services began on September 20th at Lynn, Mass. The first six days the services were to be under the direction of Rev. George C. Needham, former pastor of the Chicago Avenue (Moody) church, Chicago. Mr. Moody followed on the 26th.

—George F. Pentecost will begin a series of Sunday afternoon services at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on October 4th. He will be assisted by a large male choir, under the leadership of Mr. George C. Stebbens.

—Mrs. Maria Woodworth closed a two-weeks' meeting in Deltz's Grove, near Muncie, Ind., on the 20th inst., when 25,000 people were present. Great excitement prevailed. At least two-fifths of the people present were shouting joyously and confessing conversion. Fifty persons were thrown into a seance, some of whom remained a long time in that condition. Mrs. Woodworth's receipts and profit on stands and donations aggregate nearly $600.

—The American Methodist missionary, Johnson, has arrived in London on his return from St. Paul De Loando. He states that the American Methodist Mission, William Taylor's, there are all well and happy, and says that the reports recently circulated that the mission had suffered by deaths from starvation and disease are false, and are based solely on the fact that Charles Miller, of Baltimore, had died from illness. Mr. Miller, Mr. Johnson says, might have recovered but for his persistence in refusing to take proper medicine, which he did for the reason he gave that he "trusted in the Lord to help him through." Mr. Johnson declares that the mission has plenty of wholesome food, and has lost no member but Mr. Miller.

—Rev. George F. Pentecost once offered himself to preach the Gospel to the heathen, but was declined on account of his want of knowledge of Greek and Latin! In view of what he has since done in this country, we may surely say God has made the foolishness of that examining committee to praise him.

—The Chicago Bethesda Mission, located at Nos. 368 and 370 South Clark street, is situated in one of the most densely populated and sin-cursed portions of the city, well-named "the black-hole of Chicago." There is to be found within its immediate vicinity a population of from 10,000 to 15,000 poor creatures, huddled together in close quarters, in the midst of saloons, dance-houses, variety theaters, dago shops, gambling dens, and places of similar resort. The streets are crowded with little children. In the midst of all this darkness the Bethesda Mission stands almost alone, an embodiment of "Christ's love for the world." Here the sick poor can get medical advice and medicine without money. The children are gathered into the free kindergarten, the kitchen, industrial school, and Sabbath school. Most of them have to be washed and clothed as well as taught. Gospel temperance meetings are held nightly at the mission, under the leadership of Ben. Hogan, the reformed pugilist. The room is filled with prodigals ruined by rum who are trying to reform. On the upper floor of the building is a day nursery, where the babe from 2 weeks old to 7 years old is cared for while the mother is at work. The nursery cares for about 300 children monthly. The expense of carrying on the mission is about $300 a month.

—At the meeting of the United Presbyterian Synod, at Saratoga, N. Y., Sept. 17th, Rev. Dr. J. B. Dales, Corresponding Secretary, submitted the report of the Board of Foreign Missions. It was shown that the foreign mission work of the United Presbyterian church is in two fields—India and Egypt. The report included the following statement: We have 115 distinct mission stations, 18 foreign missionaries and 1 physician, with their wives, 15 unmarried female foreign missionaries, 235 native laborers and helpers, 10 native licentiates, and 8 ordained native ministers, making in all a missionary force of 308 persons.

—The additions to our five hundred and forty-three churches [Reformed] last year on confession of faith were 4,539, an average of about eight to each church. The result is encouraging but not satisfactory. If the conversion of souls occupied our thoughts and desires as it deserves, the number would be much larger.—Chris. Intelligencer.

—Of the German Missionary Societies the Moravian Society leads the list. The Basel Society has the largest income, about $210,000. The total receipts of all the various German societies amounted to $700,000, of which sum Germany contributed $550,000, the remainder coming from abroad, the mission fields contributing $10,000, the United States $22,000, etc.

—The Protestants of France are intending to commemorate, on the 18th of October, the second centenary of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. It is proposed to signalize this occasion by making it the starting point of a new effort to extend the blessings of evangelical Christianity in France.

—Reliable authorities place the number of evangelical preachers in this country at 76,760, the congregations at 126,109 and the communicants at 10,561,648. Of various miscellaneous sects the preachers number 38,791, the congregations 10,763, and the adherents 7,179,755. The Roman Catholics report 6,905 priests, 7,663 congregations and a constituency of 6,800,000.

—In religious mimicry and mummery the English ritualists are unexcelled. Last year they issued a "Priest's Prayer Book" which contains forms for blessing crosses, crucifixes, medals, monastic dresses, holy salt, holy water, holy ashes, etc. There is in that wing of the church a "Guild of All Souls," whose special object is the offering of masses and prayers for the dead.—Baptist Weekly.

—The growth of the churches connected with the United church of Japan during the last year has been very marked. Twenty per cent. has been added to the membership, and the advance in contributions has been seventy per cent.

—The Evangelical Alliance will hold its Conference this year in the city of Glasgow, Scotland, commencing on Oct. 6th. Glasgow was one of the earliest homes of the Allianee movement, and there are to be found many of its warmest friends, as well as some of its most powerful advocates.

—The Russian Government has issued a decree making the Greek church the established religion of the Baltic provinces. Protestanism will only be tolerated. Children born of mixed marriages are to be trained in the Greek church. The decree excites great discontent among the German settlers.

—Not only business but also the large missionary organizations of the various churches show the effects of the hard times. The Presbyterian Home Board is this year $115,000 short; the Foreign Board $60,000; the Women's Board, $30,000—a total of $205,000. The Baptist Boards report a shortage of $100,000; the Methodists are trying indeed to raise "a million for missions," but have a hard job on hand reducing an indebtedness of $175,000 still resting on their missionary agencies; the American Missionary Board (Congregationalist) wants $100,000 to come to its seventy-fifth anniversary next October out of debt; the American Missionary Association wants $53,000 to meet is annual obligations, including $13,000 shortage carried over from last year; the Home Missionary Society needs $30,000 to pay present demands on its now empty treasury, and the Congregational Union requires $15,000 to keep abreast of urgent calls upon its exchequer.

—There are between 6,000 and 8,000 Icelanders in this country, among whom there are fourteen Lutheran congregations, six in Dakota, two in Southwestern Minnesota, and the others in Manitoba. Pastor J. Bjarnason has returned from a missionary trip of nearly a month among the Icelandic settlements in the timber regions along the shores of Lake Winnipeg. He serves six congregations. He teaches the catechism to the children, as well as preaches the Gospel. A convention of the Icelandic Lutherans was held in Mountain, Dakota, last January, when a constitution for an association or synod was drafted, to be presented to the congregations for adoption: The first annual meeting was held in Winnipeg, Manitoba, from June 24th to the 28th. Twenty-two delegates were present from all the churches, and all the Icelandic congregations are now united in a synod. The synod resolved that Sunday-schools should be established in all their congregations; and also, that a monthly church paper in Icelandic should be published.

—The Danish Lutherans are active in the East as well as in the West. A church was dedicated by them in July at Oxford, N. J., costing $1,500. But in the West they settle in large numbers, and show much push. About fifty Danish families have already purchased land in the new Danish colony in Lincoln county, Minn., and a church and high scoool will soon be erected. The Danish High School at Ashland, Mich., is doing a good work. This is not a "High School" in the form of advanced studies, but rather a school for the promotion of the Christian life.

SUSQUEHANNA FREE METHODIST CONFERENCE

REPORT ON SECRET SOCIETIES.

"Voluntary associations are not necessarily sinful because they are secret. But secrecy is always a ground of suspicion. Evil works instinctively incline to darkness. Good works grow up in light. God commands us to let our light shine. Even a good cause under the shadow of secrecy invalidates its claim to open and honest men. Grace and guile can have no affinity. All secrets necessary to be kept can be kept without an oath. A bad institution ought not, and a good one need not, be secret. Philanthropic associations claiming our co-operation on Christian grounds, must do so with open face. They must lift the veil while demanding our salutation, or we cannot salute them by the way. Therefore, all secret societies are to be eschewed."—Free Methodist Discipline.

This is the position of our church on secret orders. May we never be ashamed of it. May we never depart from it. If maintaining this position tends to keep us a comparatively small people, it also tends to preserve us a holy people. The spread of holiness is our mission. The toleration of secret orders in the Christian church is believed to be a formidable barrier to the progress of scriptural holiness. This almost universal and strongly entrenched foe of vital godliness and of pure civil government, we must continue to antagonize as occasion requires. But in so doing we need great wisdom. As preachers, if we antagonize secret orders in our first ministrations on entering a new field of labor, or on commencing a protracted meeting, we may thereby effectually blockade our way to the hearts of the people. This plant which our "Heavenly Father hath not planted," can be more easily pulled up root and fibre after a thorough religious awakening than before. In all our efforts to eradicate this evil, may our position ever be scriptural, our spirits unctuous, and our guidance divine.

LODGE NOTES.

Advices from Shamokin, Pa., say that Mollie Maguireism is again rampant in the upper and lower Luzerne districts. Nine murders have recently occurred in the northern coal fields, and mines are frequently fired. Murderers and fire bugs go free and the coal and iron police seem powerless. The Mollie Maguire brotherhood has been quietly organizing since last April. Coffin notices have been received by a number of the members of the law and order society. While disorder prevails in Lower Luzerne, sanguinary transactions are becoming alarmingly frequent in Wyoming or Upper Luzerne district, hardly a day elapsing without some dark deed being recorded. The criminal record in the county about Kingston, Wilkesbarre, Pittston and Scranton is unusually great, the police court dockets being full of cases of every imaginable character.

—Late on Saturday night, says a Pittsburg daily of Sept. 21, Cooper Perey, an engineer on the Pittsburg, McKeesport and Youghiogheny railroad, was shot by James Stewart, weighmaster for the same road, at Dawson Station. Perey lived only about thirty minutes after the shooting. The principles in the affair have always been good friends until about a week ago, when both ran for the same office in a lodge. Percy was elected by a large majority, and Stewart was badly disappointed. On the night of the tragedy the men were at their work near the railroad station at Dawson, when they became involved in a discussion over the recent lodge election. Stewart finally became angered, and drawing a revolver from his hip pocket, he fired without giving an instant's notice of his murderous intention. The victim threw up his hands and fell over backward, only uttering one sharp cry. A gentleman, well acquainted with both men, who saw the shooting, says, "I don't think there is any doubt, but that Stewart became so angry over his defeat that he lost his head and shot the man, whom I had always known as his friend, without knowing what he was doing. At any rate his neck is safe enough. Nobody ever heard of a murderer being hung in Fayette county." And, of course, a member of a secret lodge relying on its power, would have his fear of the crime of murder almost taken away.

—The meeting of the "Sovereign Grand Lodge" of the Odd-fellows in Baltimore, has resulted in patching up the quarrel with the seceded branch called the "Patriarchal Circle." This was a kind of Knight Templar affair which wanted to manage its own grand affairs and so was kicked out by the Odd fellow chiefs. But a new rank having risen called the "Uniform Division," having the same general objects a compromise has been made and the two degrees united under the name, "Patriarch's Militant Degree." What are these bellicose patriarch's getting ready to fight over?

—The Supreme Council Sovereign Inspector General

for the Northern Masonic jurisdiction convened in annual session in Boston last Tuesday. There were present fifty-two active, three emeriti, and 278 honorary members, including Henry L. Palmer, Sovereign Grand Commander, and all his associate officers. The thirty-third degree Scottish rite, was conferred upon the largest class ever before the Supreme Council. Among those who were advanced to this highest degree were: Edward C. Pace, John M. Pearson, Lloyd Durant Richardson, De Laska Miller, and Charles F. Hitchcock, of Illinois.

—Garden City, of the Royal Arcanum order, furnishes a literary entertainment at its meeting Friday evening of this week. Dr. Kittredge will be present for much the same purpose as was Samson in the Philistinc temple. A profane infidel, member of this same lodge, has boasted to us that Dr. Kittredge was his brother in the lodge. "Be ye not unequally yoked together."

ANOTHER GREAT EXPOSITION.

Visitors at the great World's Exposition during its closing days could not realize that it was so soon to end and be but a memory. It was an exhibition of such great magnitude, of such unparalleled grandeur, so representative of the world's richness and progress, so indicative of great commercial and industrial possibilities, gathered together after so many months of incessant labor and at such great expense, and finally having reached completeness and perfection; and having through unfortunate and unavoidable circumstances been attended by so comparatively small a portion of the people of this country, it seemed a sacrilege that it should now cease and pass from existence. Prominent citizens of New Orleans and of the Mississippi Valley, feeling that its destiny had uot been accomplished, that the great work it had inaugurated was not sufficiently advanced, determined that the great Exposition should again be opened.

A new organization, for the formation of which steps were taken long before the closing of the World's Exposition, under the name of the North, Central and South American Exposition, has purchased the buildings and property of the World's Exposition, and will open on November 10 and continue open until April 1 next. A large number of the finest exhibits, not only of private exhibitors, but State Territorial and iuter national exhibits, like those of Mexico, were suffered to remain iu anticipation of a re-opeuiug. Already siuce the announcement hundreds of applications for space from old and new exhibitors have been received and it is said that the complete filling of the seventy-two acres covered by the buildings is certain. Capt. Samuel H. Buck, who so satisfactorily filled the position of Director-General after Major Burke's retirement, is retained as Director General, and Col. John W. Glenn, late U. S. Supervising Architect, is the new Chief of Installation.

FARM NOTES.

A fatal disease prevails among the hogs in a section a few miles west of Beloit, Wis., and it is said that at least a thousand hogs have died within two weeks past. Extensive pork raisers have lost entire herds. Most every farmer in Shirland, Ill., has lost from $200 to $500 worth of hogs and some cattle. The contagion seems to be local as yet, and is confined, so far as reported, to the towns of Shirland and Rockton, Winnebago county, Ill., and Newark, Rock county, Wis.

Mr. Stephen R. Moore, of Kankakee county, Ill., says that he has observed the effect of feeding green corn to cattle sick with Texas fever, and is of the opinion that it has done no good. It was supposed that the disease had been checked, but it appeared with increased virulence after the late storm. Mr. Moore states that all his cattle are dead, and Mr. Goodwin has lost seventy-five.

Six cows belonging to Mrs. Morris Mead, residing near West Diggings in West Galena, Ill., broke down a division fence between her pasture and a corn field and proceeded to fill themselves on green corn, and when found next morning they were all dead and their stomachs burst open.

PLOWING-IN WEEDS.

There may be some advantage in permitting weeds to grow on the stubbles, with the intention of plowing them in, provided they are not left long enough to ripen their seeds. A bare fallow in which the soil is exposed to the sun and rains, is injurious to the land: it is far better to have the soil covered with some kind of vegitation, if it is nothing but the prevalent summer weeds. Every crop of weeds plowed in, lessens the stock of weed seed in the soil, and does so much toward cleaning the land, if care is exercised to bury the weeds before the seeds are formed. An excellent method of covering the weeds is, to loop a chain from the plow beam, so that it gathers the strip of weeds on the furrow slice, and as this turns, drags the weeds into the furrow, where they are covered in completely, and buried where they will soon decay and enrich the soil.—American Agriculturist for Sept.

STORING POTATOES.

Potatoes are best stored in a dry cool cellar, where the temperature can be kept by ventilation, at about forty degrees. The floor should be of planks, raised three inches from the ground, and laid with one inch spaces between them for ventilation. The bins should be about eight feet long, four feet wide and deep, made of loose-barred partitions, wired together at the corners. A bin of this size will hold one hundred bushels, and with such a one, it is very easy to know precisely how much the crop amounts to. A box to hold a bushel will be found a great convenience in gathering and storing the potatoes. It is made eighteen inches long, fifteen inches deep in the clear at the sides, and ten inches wide, all inside measurements; thus holding two thousand and seven hundred cubic inches, or thirteen cubic inches (about two good sized potatoes) over a heaped bushel, which is two thousand and six hundred and eighty-seven inches. These boxes can be set one upon another, and then have a space left between the potatoes, and are thus well adapted for use in storing a part of the crop, or a small quantity for domestic use. The barred sides and bottom, secure abundant ventilation. The bins in the cellar should have a space of four inches between the end and the wall, and between the sides; this is easily made by placing a short rail between them.—American Agriculturist for October.

SAVE THE CORN STALKS.

Of the many things I admire in my German neighbor, none excite my respect more than the very successful way in which he manages his corn stalks. His plan does not differ from that generally adopted. He husks his corn in the field, ties the stalks into bundles, stands these bundles into stooks, and when dry draws them into the barn, or makes them into a high, narrow stack, that is pretty much all roof. The Deacon and I do the same thing. The only difference is, that we propose to draw them in to-morrow, or or the next day, or as soon as convenient and the result is, that something happens to postpone the work, and before we know it the stalks are wet, and we must wait until they get dry again. And sometimes we repeat this process of waiting for a convenient time, and November snow finds the stalks still in the field. Not so Mr. Jacobs. He does not wait. His stalks are frequently secure in the barn or stack before some of us commence to husk. His cows and young stock are in the field picking up the stray ears and scattered fodder, before they are injured by the rain, and before we realize what has been done, the field is harrowed to level down the stubbs, and the next day the boys are plowing, and getting the land ready to sow barley next spring.—Joseph Harris, in Am. Agriculturist for Oct.

IN BRIEF.

The Rev. Dr. Mayo thinks the Southern people have done more for the cause of education in fifteen years than was ever done before by any people under the circumstances.

There was on exhibition in Toledo, O., last week the largest steer in the world, weighing 4,250 pounds, and the smallest cow in the world, weighing 350 pounds and thirty-four inches high, and giving three gallons of milk per day.

Clark Whittier, a brother of the poet, has laid out a town in Swain county, North Carolina, with a view of erecting spacious saw mills and for the manufacture of lumber. The town site covers 60,000 acres of land, and the settlers who have reached the grounds have resolved that no liquors of any kind shall be bought or sold upon the domain.

Kansas, about which the Eastern press are disposed to crack jokes about "its cyclones and grasshoppers, drought," etc., has in ten years, by accurate statistics, raised $1,046,262,264 worth of products. It is only an infant, yet stands fifth in the great wheat-growing States of the Union, It looks as if the infant might outlive its critics.

Miss Marian Norwood, the actress, died Sept 9th in Bellevue Hospital, New York, from burns received the previous evening. Miss Norwood was 29 years old. She at one time impersonated Eliza in "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Monday evening she was sitting in a rocking chair smoking cigarettes. Shortly after she lay on the bed with the cigarette still in her mouth. She soon fell asleep, and the burning cigarette set her clothes on fire. Her body was burned to a crisp before the flames were put out.

An edict of the Spanish Government which went into force last year frees one slave in four every year. This will extinguish slavery upon the island in 1888. A large planter from Cuba being interviewed, said: "Slave labor is not profitable in Cuba. I have owned and worked 600 on my plantation, but now do not own a slave and hire all my laborers, and find it better and cheaper." The value of slaves has so decreased under the order for emancipation that thousands of them purchase their own liberty and hire themselves out to raise the money.

Of the 850,000 people in Eastern Roumelia 573,560 are Bulgarians and 174,700 Turks. At the close of the Turko-Russian war, which was fought by Russia to secure the freedom of the Bulgarians from Turkish oppression. Russia, as the conqueror, asked that the Bulgarians of the Balkan peninsula be constituted a nation. The Bulgarians desired this above all other things, and Turkey agreed that such a nation should be constituted. But through the influence of England the Bulgarians were divided. About 1,400,000 were included in the country now known as Bulgaria, nearly 600,000 were included in Eastern Roumelia, and a large number were left to the mercies of Turkey. The present movement, whatever intrigue may be behind it, is the effort of Bulgarians to secure the union of their people, and it is likely to become a very important question in European politics.—Inter-Ocean.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

WASHINGTON.

President Cleveland Wednesday accepted the resignation of Dorman B. Eaton, Chairman of the Civil Service Commission, to take effect Nov. 1.

The Treasury Department is making a secret investigation at New York regarding frauds by undervaluation of imported articles. It is alleged that three large houses recently paid the government in excess of $120,000 each on reappraisement of certain imports, and it is deemed probable that the sums to be paid by other firms will enrich the National Treasury by at least $1,000,000.

The U. S. vessels Swatara and Yantic, engaged in transporting $10,400,000 in silver from the New Orleans mint to the Treasury in Washington, arrived at the Washington navy yard Friday night. When the coin is received at the Treasury Department it will be counted—a labor which, with the present force, will occupy about two months.

The Chief of the Bureau of Statistics reports that the total values of the imports of merchandise during the twelve months ended August 31, 1885, were $571,235,943, and during the twelve months ended August 31, 1884, $657,871,316, a decrease of $86,635,373. The values of the exports of merchandise during the twelve months ended August 31, 1885, were $722,765,461, and during the preceding twelve months $735,018,792, a decrease of $12,253,331.

Commodore Semmes, one of the ablest officers of the navy, committed suicide at the house of Miss Jane Jenney, near Hamilton, last Tuesday. Doctors of Leesburg say that the deceased had been in bad health for some months, and was thought to be improving. At about four o'clock Tuesday afternoon, however, being left alone for a few minutes he secured his razor, and while laboring under aberration perpetrated the fatal deed by cutting his throat.

The New York Democratic State Convention Thursday nominated David B. Hill for Governor on the first ballot, the Governor receiving 338 out of the 380 votes cast. An adjournment was then taken until morning to complete the ticket and consider the platform.

During the year ended Sept. 1 last Minneapolis exported 2,121,488 barrels of flour, against 1,785,450 barrels the previous year.

Every gambling house in Chicago is running. Lookouts are kept on guard to prevent surprises, but "ropers" and "pigeons" are bringing in victims. It is said that Mike McDonald has threatened to prove that Harrison wasn't elected in case the gambling interests are interfered with.

A fire in the Chicago lumber yard district Friday consumed over 5,000,000 feet of lumber and an office building, causing a loss closely estimated at $120,000, on which there is insurance to the amount of $100,000.

Five Chinamen, charged with murder and robbery, were taken from jail at Pierce City, Idaho, Monday night, and hanged.

Disguised and armed men visited the Black Diamond Mines, near Seattle, W. T., Monday night, drove the Chinese from their houses, and burned the premises. The citizens of the district maintain that the Federal authorities make no pretence of preventing the influx of the Chinese from British Columbia.

Barnum's circus met with a serious accident Tuesday afternoon at Titusville, Pa. The big tent holding 10,000 spectators suddenly collapsed in a violent wind and rain storm. Half the people inside cut their way through with their knives or crept out under the canvas. Twenty-five persons were slightly injured, but none killed or seriously hurt.

Three inches of snow fell Wednesday in the Derby Line (Vt.) section.

A huge red meteoric ball appeared in the sky over Conception Bay, Newfoundland, Thursday night, and was visible for nearly ten minutes.

While in a drunken rage, Sunday night, at Silver Creek, a Pennsylvania mining village, Mrs. Sarah O'Neill dragged Betty Keefe, her husband's aged aunt, from bed and beheaded her with an ax. Mrs. O'Neill charged her victim with fomenting quarrels in the household.

Small-pox has broken out in a tenement in Grand street, New York, four cases having already developed. The source of the malady is unknown. For the week ended Sunday night there were 216 deaths from small-pox in Montreal.

Several lumber mills in Northern Michigan have been closed owing to the ten-hour law, the men refusing to work more than the statutory number of hours unless wages are proportionately increased. At Manistee alone 1,000 men are idle.

FOREIGN.

Thirty-two deaths from small-pox occurred in Montreal Saturday.

It is estimated that between 40,000 and 70,000 people attended the socialist meeting in London Sunday. The police did not interfere with the gathering, and no disturbance occurred.

A report comes from Bucharest that fighting occurred Friday near Adrianople and that during the engagement thirty Roumelians were killed and three hundred wounded.

The revolution in Bulgaria was apparently a surprise to Europe, and is creating the deepest interest on account of the connection of the powers engaged in the treaty of Berlin. Semi-official advices tend to confirm the report that Prince Alexander of Bulgaria acted entirely independent of Russia in annexing Roumelia, and was impelled only by Bulgarian public opinion. It is considered improbable that Turkey will accept pecuniary compensation for the loss of Roumelia, because the Balkan frontier is necessary to defend Constantinople. It is believed the Porte has resolved to fight in order to restore the statu quo, but the fact that the powers are desirous of peace diminishes the gravity of the situation.

The feeling in St. Petersburg regarding the Roumelian question is hourly becoming more warlike. The sympathy of the masses is strongly with the Bulgarians. It is stated that the Czar has telegraphed the Minister of War to prepare plans for a campaign in the event of the opening of hostilities between Bulgaria and Turkey, as he is determined to support Prince Alexander's scheme of unity between Bulgaria and Roumelia.

A London dispatch states that there is an increasing belief in diplomatic circles that a conference of the powers will be convened for the purpose of settling the Roumelian affair. Severe fighting has occurred between the Turks and Albanians, both sides losing heavily. The Servian army is being mobilized.

A wrecked steamer, on which was a wrecking crew of twenty men, ashore off of Grand Manan, New Brunswick, disappeared during a hurricane Tuesday night, and it is believed that all on board perished.

It was reported at Philadelphia, in the Centennial Temperance conference, that 2,250,000 persons had been put through the initiatory of the Sons of Temperanee, and that $8,450,000 had been raised by the order. From other late reports it appears that this order, for years almost unheard of, has revived with the popularity of the women's work, and is initiating some 30,000 a year, yet losing almost as many. In contrast with the actual advaneement of the temperanee eause by this order, consider what results the Woman's Christian Temperanee Union will be able to show when its roll reaches an equal number and its treasury so large an ineome. The differenec is, the seeret order spends and labors for itself, the open one for temperanee. The prohibition movement is happily opening the eyes of men to the folly of this lodge business. Thus the Grand Lodge of Good Templars in Illinois shows a loss of thirty local lodges in a year, while all the while the temperanee work has been going on grandly to a glorious eonsummation.

The Utah eourts are grinding out the polygamy eases rapidly of late. The Mormon bishop, John Sharp, plead guilty to the eharge of unlawful eohabitation, promising to abandon polygamy and obey the law hereafter. On aeeount of his high position and influence, it is believed many Mormons will follow his example. Bishop Hiram B. Clawson would not abjure, and was fined $300, with six months' imprisonment—the full extent of the law. Another who elaimed that polygamy was by direct revelation from God received the same sentence, Judge Zane informing him that he was simply uttering eant and hypocrisy. The editor of the Deseret News, the offieial Mormon organ, plead not guilty, but testified against himself. He has been one of the most fanatieal of the Mormons. During the past week ten eases were passed upon, only four pleading guilty. Many Mormons are leaving Southern Utah for Mexieo, in spite of the opposition of Mexiean priests. It is said, the Mexican Congress has granted to President John Taylor and his associates large tracts of land in Sonora, Chihuahua, and other States near the northern boundary for the use of eolonies. There are indieations, however, that they may not be able to retain these lands, for the influenee of the Roman Catholies is by no means yet gone from Mexican polities. A Mormon mission to India has failed entirely, but their emissaries in Europe continue to send over large eompanies. No less than four, numbering some 1,200, have been sent during this year. The missionaries in England, emboldened by distanee, threaten our government with the vengeance of heaven for its cruelties, hypoerisy and Judge Jeffrey eourts.

General S. C. Armstrong of the eelebrated Hampton school in Virginia, has been reviving an interest in the Indian question in many loealities. He believes that the treaty-making policy so long followed by our government is aeeountable for many and cruel blunders and unspeakable outrages. The tribal-tenure plan has been diabolieal in its influences upon the Indian and the greedy white man, a measure for enforeing idleness and giving it a premium. The remedy, he believes, is in Christian edueation, the influence of the church and a publie sentiment whieh Congress eannot disregard. He is in favor of some measure like that proposed by Senator Dawes, whieh treats the Indian as a man. The tribal system should be abolished, the Indian reservations should be opened to settlement, and eaeh Indian should be given his proper share of the world's goods and be made to paddle his own eanoe. Where the Indians are eompelled to work they do well.

Senator Ingalls of Kansas, has had also positive opinions on the Indian question, but it seems they were eapable of improvement. During a visit to the Indian Territory a while sinee he, to his surprise, found out that they are making rapid advances in self-government, and so far from being the brutes in human form they are so often pietured in fervid Western oratory, they are displaying some admirable virtues, sueh as would adorn the most enlightened eommunity. Among the 70,000 inhabitants he found no paupers, no one supported at publie expense, and no one laeking a home. In addition to these rather remarkable indications of progress, he learned that there are no laws for the collection of debt, owing to the very ereditable fact that the standard of eommereial honor is so high that none are needed. As a result of this visit it is said that Senator Ingalls has beeome a warm advoeate of Indian eivilization

The attractions of Romanism and of the seeret lodges for the colored people have been often mentioned of late in the Cynosure. Dr. Roy's observations led him to regard the danger from the former as slight; while Geo. W. Cable in the Century believes the blacks yet unlearned in the "evil eharms of unions, leagues, seeret orders," ete. We have evidenee that they already know too mueh of them and the New York Witness notes some danger from the papacy thus: "The eontumelious and irritating treatment of the eolored people by several denominations of Christians will have a strong tendeney to drive them into the Church of Rome, whieh is plying skilful means to obtain votes. Many negroes have already joined that ehureh beeause it treats them like men and Christians, and the number is likely to be inereased rapidly on learning the conduet of a portion of the clergymen of the Protestant Episeopal ehureh in South Carolina. These singular Christian ministers strive to keep out elergymen of their own ehureh from their eonvoeations, against whom no eharge is made but that they are colored. These supporters of raee-prejudiee refuse to give the title of elergymen to any but white men."

The aetion of the Post-office Department in requiring the new special delivery serviee to be eondueted on the Sabbath has aroused the friends of that day to make a strong protest. There are eireumstanees eonneeted with this delivery whieh make Sabbath work unusually objeetionable. The messengers employed are boys—in Chieago 100 are employed, and a proportionate number in every town of 4,000 inhabitants or over. These lads must be on duty during the day when their characters should be forming in a different school than government business, and the protest of the National Reform Association should be endorsed by every Christian and patriot. This revival of a needed reform in our own eountry receives encouragement from the success of efforts in Europe for the sanctity of the Sabbath. In Denmark a society composed of many of the best people in the country has been organized to seeure to workingmen their day of rest. In Holland some advantages have been gained, partieularly in eonneetion with the Post-office. In Belgium two hundred luggage trains, which ran formerly on Sundays, have been stopped, and nearly 8,000 men employed in the government workshops have been set free from Sabbath labor. The movement is making progress even in Naples. Signor Seccarelli has appealed to the Italian House of Representatives on behalf of the railway men, and Protestants of all denominations are being urged to form a league for the sanetification of the Lord's day.

—Sinee writing the above, it is with deep satisfaction we read that the Postmaster General has countermanded the order for special deliveries on the Sabbath.

Chief-Justiee Noah Davis, of New York Supreme Court, says: "My twenty-nine years of experienee as Judge taught me that of all the causes of sin and misery, of sorrow and woe, of pauperism and wretchedness, intoxieating liquors stand forth the unapproaehable ehief."

Here, in my opinion, lies one of the greatest seerets of praetieal godliness, and the highest attainment in elose walking with God—to come daily and wash, and yet to keep as great a value for this discovery of forgiveness, as if it were onec only obtained and no more.—Thomas Halyburton (about 1698).

SOCIAL PURITY IN ENGLAND.

BY REV. JOHN BOYES.

Sinee the revelations of the Pall Mall Gazette of the seeret forms of viee practiced in this country, the various agencies for securing soeial purity have been more vigorous and aetive. Homes for the proteetion of young girls have been established in many of the towns, and agencies founded in some of the villages, that girls may have guidance and protection. Soon after the issue of the Pall Mall revelations, an act was hurried through Parliament raising the age of proteetion from the age of 13 to 16 years, though the latter age seems to me absurdly low. The enthusiastie demonstrations whieh have taken place in London and elsewhere, show that the publie feeling is not to be trifled with. The unanimity and earnestness of the proceedings compel us to reeognize their moral worth. There has been engendered a sense of shame that in our very midst a system of eriminal and almost eompulsory vice should have existed. The new Criminal Law Amendment Act vigorously enforeed will doubtless make such things more difficult in the future; and if the people will honestly earry out the resolutions they have passed at the demonstrations, the maidenhood of the country will be vastly benefited. There are many who rightly insist that the age of proteetion should be 21 years, taking their stand on the principle that there shall be one law for the rich and poor alike. Meanwhile we have gained much by the reeent agitation, and if the people who are most affeeted by the evils, and those who are the responsible guardians of publie virtue will act in unison in seeing the law vigorously enforced, much more may be done in rooting out the foul soeial leprosy.

Of eourse in all movements we expeet to meet with some who misrepresent existing facts. For example, Miss Muller, one of the speakers at St. Jamcs' Hall, London, deelared that no man ean be trusted. This is certainly an exaggeration, and surely in making the statement she did a gross injustice to her own better judgment. A state of soeiety in whieh this would be true would be about on a par with Sodom. While admitting that the tone of morals is lamentably low with many men, we are glad to believe that there are others whose morals reach a New Testament standard. If, however, this Purity Crusade succeeds, whether in the form of the White Cross movement, as led by the chivalrous and learned Bishop of Durham, or by other humbler methods, in making men more careful of their own honor and more reverential towards womanhood, it will be one of the greatest blessings ever conferred upon our country.

We know nothing that is wiser or more likely to be useful than the charge of Bishop Temple to the London clergy, and if the clergy of all churches will follow his recommendations, good will result from the demonstrations that have been made. There seems, however, to be a serious defect in these movements. Little has been said hitherto about the connection between drinking and the secret empire of vice, though it is evident that drink is one of the roots of the social evil. There are also the baneful and pernicious fashions of the age to be combatted, as a source of unspeakable misery. It is not man the so-called "Lord of the creation," who supports the present extravagant and wasteful fashions in dress, nor who appears in fashionable assemblies in a state of semi-nudity. With the present incomes the vast majority of young men cannot afford to marry and keep up an establishment according to the fashionable ideas of the hour. Young women nursed in the lap of luxury, and living in stately homes, are not likely to accept the modest home that an industrious and worthy young man is able to offer her. The result of this is that marriage is deferred till a comparatively late period in life, and a variety of evils are the result. We could wish that the heroic women of England would set to work to destroy the fashion and extravagance which make marriage impossible, and celibacy a necessity for so many of our young men.

Grimsby, England, Sept., 1885.

THE RELATION OF SECRET SOCIETIES TO THE GUILDS OF MEDIÆVAL TIMES.

It is a common observation that much stress is laid on the age of an institution: because very old, men think it must be good, having gone through many trials and crises: that it has good resources and has gathered many experiences, and will so be able bravely to face coming dangers. Hence we need not wonder that sometimes institutions, unlike ladies, claim to be of older age than is really true. We find this true with the lodges, many of which claim to be of an extreme old age. But let us look at their claims and see what they are and how they are supported.

Before we proceed, we must do justice to some, a few, who do not believe these claims. A. B. Grosh, Pocket Manual on Odd-fellowship says, p. 25, that all these claims have been discarded as without proof, as baseless and silly stories; and in the "Odd-Fellow" for July, 1870, p. 436, they are called baseless and ridiculous assertions.

It is impossible for want of space to name all those men who, according to Masonic tradition, belonged to the secret societies, which were the predecessors of the lodges of to-day.

Some (see Pocketbook of the O. F., 1868, p. 14) date Odd-fellowship back to the time when Adam happily lived in the beautiful garden of Eden, where God is said to have instituted him in the rites of Freemasonry. They say there is an emblem representing Adam laying the foundation-stone of the "order" in the Grand Lodge of the U. S. (Manual p. 24). What are the historical proofs for this assertion? They are as baseless as for the assertion that Adam went out on steamboat excursions on Sunday. We will rather date the institution a little further back to the time when Satan rebelled against God: as for this we have at least the similarity of principles between the father, Satan, and his child, secret societies.

Others find traces of Masonry in the building of the tower of Babel. Again no proofs can be produced, except that there we find their principle, to show every man that he is able to do good by his own power and faculties (see O. F. Manuel p. 45), expressed in the blasphemous words of self-reliance: "Let us build a city and a tower, whose top may reach unto heaven." From this time dates the existence of paganism, and if Masonry desires to confess it is heathenism, then let them take this passage as their proof, and cling to the rule: By my own help will I accomplish all. Let us rather follow the Scriptures and believe that we can do nothing by our faculties and power except by the help of God.

Others try again to prove that Solomon was a Noble Grand, etc., but these claims have been mere assertions. They cannot be proven by a single line of history.

Such absurd claims that Moses, Aaron, John the Baptist, or John the Evangelist were initiated or held a high rank, rest on the same foundation, that is—none.

"Brother" Cooper, in 1840, (cf. Donaldson, O. F. Text Book, 1859, p. 18) says, that the order of Odd-fellows was founded by Roman soldiers under Nero, 55, A. D., and were called fellow citizens, which name was changed by the Emperor Titus, 79, A. D., into Odd-fellows. We should be very glad if the learned "brother" would have given his references and stated in which old, worn-out manuscript he has found this great historical fact. Perhaps it is to be found in Cicero, Horace, Virgil, Martial, Pliny, or Tacitus? Or may be in one of the lost books of Livy? Any "brother" finding it will please let us have it.

We are referred to the rites of the lodges as signs of antiquity, as it is said, it takes a long time to have them so finished, etc. I simply ask you to accompany me through the streets of any large city. Do you see that building; how old it looks? Look through the window and see the workmen finishing up the inside and see the painter paint the curves of the brass pillars to make them appear old. To imitate antiquity is not so impossible a procedure.

Let us now look at the relation of lodges to the ancient secret societies. We are referred to the Egyptian secret societies, their priests and rites. That they existed is true. Yes, they were secret, perhaps more secret than modern lodges. But there is as little evidence of any actual connection between the two as between the feathers of Gabriel's wings and the quills of a goose. And in essence they differ as much as an iceberg and a tornado that have only this in common, that they are both dangerous. Neither have the lodges any connection with the Greek or Roman societies; or, if they claim to be in connection by their principles, we will let them have this doubtful honor. These societies were made up of the lowest of humanity, where the worst revelries took place, where the harlots abounded.

The Masons claim also to have a connection, to be the successors of the guilds of masons in mediaeval times, but we can prove from history that they are entirely different societies. All know that in those times, the good old times for the trades, no clerk could or would be employed who had not served several years and made his examinations as apprentice, or assistant, and that no one was allowed to begin a business unless he had passed a strict examination. In order for protection against defrauders and impostors every trade from the meanest up to the highest had its own particular secrets (such as certain phrases of opening a conversation) in which technical terms were used so that every impostor could be well detected. These guilds were in close connection with the church and not in opposition to the church as the Freemasons of to-day. The guilds of the masons excelled very much in their zeal for the church. Only pious workmen could be accepted as we see from the old statutes. These guilds did build nearly all the great churches and domes and cathedrals, which to-day are the wonder of all builders and of all men of taste; and they did all their work for nothing receiving only the materials for their sustenance. They built their cottages of light material near the building place and lived a peaceful life working busily; and when they had finished their work they traveled on to do the same work of charity at some other place.

It is true they had certain rights and customs, but you can as well prove that the planets circulate about the moon as show that they are identical with the signs of the Freemasons. They had certain rites of laying the foundation and of finishing the house, but they are entirely different from the absurd fashions of the lodges of to-day.

Such lodges of church-building masons were also at London, building some of the churches there at the beginning of the eighteenth century. Some persons of the higher classes frequently visited the structures and marked how the diligent workmen labored and the beautiful spires rose higher and higher into the air. As they had so much interest in the work, and by practice studied the science of architecture, the masons had the politeness to take them into their union or guild as honorary members, or, as they were called, "accepted masons." The churches being finished, the working masons went on to some other place. The accepted, non-working masons were kept behind, in possession of the few signs and phrases of recognition. They came together, and began to come together in some drinking house for conviviality. But soon it took up the deistic principles which existed at that time among the people of the higher classes, and these they have retained until to-day, as has been satisfactorily proved to them.

G. J. F.

WHAT OF THAT?

Tried! well, and what of that?
Didst fancy life was spent on beds of ease,
Fluttering the rose leaves scattered by the breeze?
Come, rouse thee! work while it is called to-day
Coward, arise; go forth thy way!

Lonely! and what of that?
Some must be lonely; 'tis not given to all
To feel a heart responsive rise and fall—
To blend another life into its own.
Work may be done in loneliness: work on!

Dark! well, and what of that?
Didst fondly dream the sun would never set?
Dost fear to lose thy way? Take courage yet!
Learn thou to walk by faith and not by sight,
Thy steps will guided be and guided right.

Hard! well, and what of that?
Didst fancy life one summer holiday,
With lessons none to learn, and naught but play?
Go, get thee to thy task! Conquer or die.
It must be learned. Learn it, then, patiently.

No help! nay, 'tis not so;
Though human help be far, thy God is nigh,
Who feeds the raven hears his children's cry.
He's near thee wheresoe'er thy footsteps roam.
And he will guide thee, light thee, help thee home.

INHUMAN CRIMES IN ENGLAND.

[Cardinal Manning in the North American Review.]

You may wish to learn whether these enormities were not already known, and, if known, why they were not long ago exposed. The answer, I believe, is this: They were known as forms are seen in the dark. We are sure of their existence. Here and there terrible cases came before our courts or were dealt with in private. The state of our streets at night gradually awakened attention and caused remonstrance. The efforts to check these evils were partial and intermittent. The extent of the immoral world in the midst of us was altogether unrecognized; its organization and systematic purveying and its almost ubiquitous activity were not only not ascertained but not even suspected; and, when suspected, were treated as incredible. Excepting only those whose professions and duties brought them into immediate contact with the terrible realities of life, the greater part of the upper and governing classes of England in London were more or less living in a fool's paradise. Our newspaper press has been, happily, singularly guarded and pure. In social life such subjects are seldom if ever mentioned. Many men may have known of them, but the great multitude of women have lived and died without any knowledge of what passes in the very streets in which they dwell. Under the shelter of this unconsciousness every form of evil is multiplied.

I will not ask whether our state is worse at this day than it was in 1820 or 1830, which was a period of extraordinary and barefaced wickedness. It is enough to say that, with the rapid increase of the population in London, a steady relaxation of all social and moral authority and a perceptible breaking up of the domestic life of the people have continually grown upon us.

At length, the knowledge of these terrible iniquities forced itself upon our attention, and in 1881 a commission took evidence and reported on the immoralities in London, and especially on the traffic in young girls between London and the Continent. The revelations of that report fall little short of the revelations of the Pall Mall Gazette. But a blue book is read by few, and, except to those concerned—I may say to experts on the subject—the report of the commission has remained almost unknown. I have never so much as seen it. A bill founded on it, and intended to check these immoral practices, was introduced into the House of Lords. It was much opposed and weakened, and, finally, for want of time, it was dropped. The bill was again introduced in the following year, and with the same result. Once more, in 1884, it was discussed, and again suffered to drop. In the session of the present year, 1885, it passed the House of Lords, weakened to such a point as to afford protection only to girls of fifteen years of age. The bill reached the House of Commons. As usual, it encountered considerable opposition, and, finally, was talked out on a Wednesday, on which day the House rises at six o'clock. It then seemed as if all hope of protection was thrown over to 1886. That is to say, five long years, still with uncertain result, have been wasted over a measure for which the vital necessity to the moral life of England ought to have obtained a peremptory and prompt legislation.

This heartless delay, full of fatal consequences of demoralization and wreck and ruin to the innocent, the helpless of our people, justly aroused the indignation of those to whom justice and mercy are more dear than the redistribution of seats or the disfranchisement for medical relief. Prompted—I might say stung—by an indignant impatience, the editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, and other like-minded men, defying all antagonists, entered upon their warfare against the dominion of cruelty and lust. I have said elsewhere, that many of those who profoundly sympatize in the motives which induced the Pall Mall Gazette to take up the question might have desired its modes and expressions to have been revised and chastened; but that in snch a matter of moral life and death, and above all, when the obloquy and calumny of the bad, and hasty and shortsighted censures of some good men, were heaped upon those who entered the furnace to save souls, I should hold it to be not only ungenerous, but cowardly and cruel, not to stand between the handful of men who, for the moral life of England, dared this courageous action, and the whole world of their censors.

The moral sense of this country has been profoundly aroused. Our public newspapers in the provinces, without number, have written with great ardor and indignation, and forty-one public meetings in snch places as parts of London, Liverpool, Manchester, and Sheffield have been held. In thirteen days the immense pressnre brought to bear upon the Government has compelled it to promise that the Criminal Law Amendment bill shall pass into the statute book before Parliament is prorogued. If it were to be defeated by any of the means which have wasted the last few years, no one can foresee what might be the popular excitement and the indignation in the conntry. Most assuredly at the next general election, when 2,000,000 new voters, chiefly the fathers and sons of the working-classes, shall appear at polling booths, all those who have obstructed the bill to protect the children and the girls of this country will meet with no toleration.

ATHEISM AND ANARCHY.

Atheism and anarchy are mother and daughter. In modern times each has international opportunity of mischief. It was written of old that the fool hath said in his heart that there is no God. In our day the fool hath said this in the newspapers and on the platform. He would be glad to say in public law, not only that there is no God, bnt that there ought to be no family, no church, no property. There is a difference between anarchists and socialists; but the most radical of the communistic and socialistic and nihilistic movements of our time are atheistic in origin. We must not regard these enterprises of unbalanced men as unworthy of serious discussion; for they are represented by powerful secret organizations, particularly active in the great cities on both sides the Atlantic, and rapidly maturing, if not already possessing an organization that encircles the earth. One of the old Norse gods, according to the mythology of our forefathers, was asked to drink a horn fnll of water. He drank, and continued to drink, but found that the horn communicated with the hollow scales of the Mid-guard serpent which encircled the planet. In order to empty the horn it was necessary for him to empty the ocean. Now and then we are startled by explosions of socialistic and nihilistic and anarchistic conspiracies, and think that they are local affairs. In most cases they are the outcome of the international, organized activity of men possessed of little or no creed except atheism; and very soon, unless the national organizations are broken up, they will be linked together around the world, and only international action will be able to empty the scales of the Mid-guard serpent. It is asserted, on very high authority, that most of those who commit such daring crimes as have lately startled civilization, are detailed committees, who act under penalty of death. If they do not murder, if they do not burn, if they do not explode dynamite, they are themselves to be put to death by their own associates.

There are, I suppose, scores of fairly well educated and respectably well endowed men among the socialists, communists, nihilists, and anarchists of Europe, who hng atheism to their bosoms as the latest deliverance of science. A materialistic philosophy has led them, in part, to this series of ghastly negations. Materialistic evolution they usually accept as a fact. Their own immorality, in many cases, has made them fit to be the dupes of these lies. Social vice and atheism have close relations throughout Europe. The Irish suffer, perhaps as much as anybody of the population of Europe; but they are not atheists, they are not immoral. Compared with other nations, the Irish preserve a very high degree of social purity. It is not to be said that calamity in regard to famine and low wages brings on atheism; for, if this were so, we shonld find the Irish as atheistic as people in the center of Europe.

Socialistic voters increase their nnmbers rapidly where atheistic notions prevail. In Germany, in 1871, there were only 120,000 socialistic voters; in 1877 there were 497,000. In the city of Berlin in 1871 there were 1,900 only; in 1878 there were 56,000. There has been a similar growth in Hamburg and in Leipzig, and in nearly every other great German city. The highest rate of suicide in Europe is found in the heart of Germany, and here the densest forms of blasphemy in the shape of materialistic atheism are to be found. It is to be accounted for in large degree by the depressing effect of heavy taxes, low wages and military conscription. Since 1876 improvement has begun in Germany; but, on nearly every quarter of the horizon in Europe hangs a threatening haze of anarchy and atheism. The Mid-guard serpent begins to encircle the earth, and he will not always be content as he is represented in the famous symbol, with biting his own tail. A criminal in a prison on the Rhine left on the walls of his cell, not long ago, this philosophy for his successors: "I will say a word to you. There is no heaven or hell. When once yon are dead, there is an end of everything. Therefore, ye scoundrels, grab wherever you can; only do not let yourselves be grabbed. Amen." * * * * *

My final hope is in the church. My final hope is in the imitation of him who went from honse to house doing good. While we make this snpreme measure of relief, let us organize agencies, national, state and municipal, of which the official business shall be to know the condition of the poor, and to publish it for all men to read. Let us bring the condition of our brethren and our sisters, and of the children in what we call the lower strata of society, close home to ourselves; for God knows how soon that condition may be that of our descendants. There is a solidarity in modern society. There is a solidarity among modern nations. If one member suffers, the whole organism suffers. Only a strong pull, and a long pnll, and a pull together, and a pull with God's hand lifting ours, will save the poor from their distresses. A fair day's wages for a good day's work—let us insist on that. Let us drive atheism out of the slums by appearing in them ourselves, with the light that never was on sea or land burning in our foreheads and in our bosoms.—Joseph Cook.

FACTS OF LODGERY.

Two brothers of the chnrch got into a difficulty: each belonged to a different society. We will for conveniency call them Bros. P. and R. A committee was appointed to adjust the difficulty if possible, but the church in appointing took no cognizance of of their associations, supposing all Christians, and of conrse would govern themselves according. The church appointed the majority of the committee from the same society to which Bro. P. belonged.

Though it was a case in which it was hard to arrive at a definite conclusion as to which was right or wrong, and therefore it was very generally understood that each brother would have to make some sacrifice in order to adjust the matter. But the majority of the committee being members of Bro. P's society, soon brought in a decision in favor of Bro. P. and expelled Bro. R. But the principle underlying the whole scheme was so glaring that the church revoked the decision, and the brothers were then compelled to settle their difficulties from a Christian spirit after the church discharged that committee. That case was settled formally, but Bro. R. has always regarded that committee as his enemies, while the men who composed that committee look at Bro. R. with a similar disrespect. It was only necessary to bring about something which would throw these opposing brothers together in discussion or similar work, for anyone who had a historical knowledge of the fact to see it again exhibited if not even hinted. Yet such a spirit has been known to exist as long as three years, without any possible way of removing it. All growing out of the fact that members belonged to worldly organizations.—Living Way, Memphis.

Martin Luther on Church Festivals.—"Let all fertivals be abolished, and let none but Sunday be observed; or if people desire to keep the great Christian festivals, let them be celebrated only in the morning, and let the rest of the day be like any other working-day. For as on those days men do nothing but drink, gamble, indulge in every sin, or remain idle, they offend God on the festivals more than at other times."—Luther's Appeal to the Emperor and Christian Nobility of the German Nation.

A PLAN TO EVANGELIZE THE WORLD.

BY DR. ARTHUR T. PIERSON.

After twenty years of almost constant thought, study and prayer over this missionary problem, I ask my brethren to consider the entire feasibility of the following measures:

First, an ecumenical council, called in some of the great world centers, like London, New York, or, as I would be glad to see it, in Rome, the old heart of the Papacy; in Constantinople, the golden gate of the Moslem empire; or in Jerusalem, the very spot of our Lord's martyrdom. Let every Christian denomination be represented by commissioners clothed with authority; and let two things there be done:

1. Let the representatives of every missionary field and work of the world be present, and like Paul and Barnabas returning to Antioch from their first missionary tour, rehearse all that God has done with them, and how he has opened the door of faith nnto the Gentiles. Let the facts be presented, that overwhelming mass of testimony which shows that never since the world began have such stupendous movements been known, such startling divine interpositions, as during the last hundred years of modern missions. Let it be established in the mouth of scores of missionaries from the pillars of Hercules to the golden gate of California, that God has flnng wide open the ports and portals of sealed empires, and hnrled to the ground the walls and barriers of ancient creeds and customs; how he has brought all nations into neighborhood, and woven together by the shuttles of commerce and civilization the very history and destiny of the whole human family; let the Christian world be compelled to confront the evidence that no expenditure of men, money and means has ever brought such rapid and rich returns as the missionary enterprise; that even the apparent waste of heroic lives has been but the breaking of the alabaster box, filling the whole habitable world with the perfume of unselfish piety, and impelling to its imitation. Let the testimonies come in from the Hawaiin Isles, first fruit of the sea unto God; from India, the very armageddon of the ages; from Syria, where the Lord himself sanctified the soil with his blood; from Japan, striding as with the seven leagued boots toward a Christian civilization; from Ethiopia, stretching forth her black and manacled hands to God; from Madagascar, which promises to be the angel standing at the eastern gateway of the Dark Continent to sound the Gospel trumpet; from the eastern archipelagoes, pointing a thousand church spires like mute fingers unto the sky; from papal France and Italy, breaking loose from the bonds of a thousand years of priestcraft, popular superstition and bloody inquisition, to welcome the pure Gospel. Let all the Christian church be aroused from apathy and lethargy by hearing a thousand trumpets like the sound of many celestial thunders mingling their voices, declaring how the kingdoms of the world are already being ground to powder before the stone cut out of the mountain without hands! Facts are the fingers of God! let them write as in letters of fire on the walls of our cathedral churches and palaces of selfishness, till luxury and carnality shall tremble to reflect how the very vessels of the temple that should be used in conveying the Gospel are on the banquet tables of mammon!

2. Then let the whole world-field be mapped out, and divided and distributed among the evangelical denominations of Christendom, so that every province and district shall be under competent and responsible care. In order to prevent waste of resources, and undue friction, and the shameful spectacle of antagonizing sects divided in the very face of a united foe, let other denominations now magnanimously withdraw from fields where one or two denominations are already successfully working and established, and have right or priority; let the great purpose and motto be, occupation of destitute fields and evangelization, where, as yet, no missions have reached. Let there be an amicable adjustment of the boundaries of each field, and an agreement upon the principles of mutual comity and co-operation. But above all, let no field be left unprovided for, in all the world. The monks of the Middle Ages set us an example which might well be revived in these days, when they went in companies of twelve, electing one of their number as a captain, and took possession of unoccnpied territory for Christ. Under the inspiration of Dr. Judson Smith's enthusiasm, the Oberlin Band was recently formed, to take as a field the province of Shensi, China, and twelve graduates with their wives are to be scattered over that province to possess it for the Master.

Is it not high time that we, who look for, should also hasten the coming of the Lord by speedily preaching the Gospel, as a witness in all the world to every living creatnre?—Words and Weapons.

FROM THE GENERAL AGENT.

WHAT A LECTURER MAY AND SHOULD ACCOMPLISH.

Savanna, Ill., Sept. 28th, 1885.

The Sabbath I spent at Byron, preaching twice, and have just reached this point on the way to Moline. During the trip I have been more than ever impressed with the absolute necessity of having every available and competent man in the field, pressing the work to the utmost. Wherever I go the really good people, those who live in the light, are anxious for the truth. They want no superficial presentations of the subject, for the era of curiosity is largely passed. Thorough, candid discussion only will meet the present demand. The people want to know the influence of lodgery in business, in court decisions, and in the church. Every neighborhood furnishes cases that are vexatious, and parties who have suffered want the mystery solved. The lecturer who can do this will readily obtain a hearing and find friends and assistance. Every one who takes up this subject at its present advanced stage should understand that thoroughness is a prime requisite to success. Only those who study the system with care and possess themselves of its material facts will find their services in demand. No lecturer should venture upon the field until he has systematized his thoughts and arguments and carefully arranged his facts, so as to defy assault from opponents. Three thoroughly prepared and carefully written lectures is the very least that should be considered sufficient to make a beginning. These should be revised and re-written a half score of times, if need be, and condensed into the smallest possible compass consistent with perspicuity. It may not be necessary, indeed it is generally better not to be encumbered with a full manuscript, but it is necessary to write, and to write very carefully, and the men are exceptional who will succeed for any length of time without it. In nine cases out of ten they will wander through a kind of "hop, skip and jump" talk, for which the best thinkers in the audience will neither pray or pay, because it is not what they want.

There are points where a single speech will do good by fixing a few points and calling attention to the subject, but in my judgment the rule should be not less than three meetings at any point of importance. The first I would devote largely to awakening inquiry, and raising questions, with sufficient of exposition to set the people to talking. Give the plain, pointed, unvarnished truth at the second meeting and back up every statement with the proof. By the third meeting, by using diligence, you will have gathered facts and incidents in the community which can be thrown in to illustrate a prepared lecture and clinch the arguments presented. Make sure of local facts and then use them fully, but not in an offensive or defiant manner. Kindly, but firmly, challenge a denial, and if any one comes forward to refute your statements, treat him with the utmost courtesy, but never permit an opponent to withdraw under any circumstances until he is pushed to the wall and you have gained a clear victory for the truth. When this point is gained, it will be not only safe but very helpful to take a collection, and urge the circulation of reform literature. People will not subscribe for the Cynosure or invest their money in our literature until they see the efficiency of our work and become interested in its prosecution.

GOOD MEETINGS WITH THE SWEDISH BRETHREN.

Moline, Ill.—My first evening here was spent with the students of Augustana College. I took supper with them in their boarding hall and afterwards spoke in the chapel. Several of the professors and about two hundred of the students were present and gave close attention. Prof. R. F. Weidner opened and closed the services with brief but fervent words of prayer. I felt that in addressing so many who are soon to be the thoughts men and pastors among such a growing and thrifty portion of our population, a great opportunity was given me. Should my life be spared, and should I continue in my present relation with the anti-lodge reform, I hope to meet some of these strong young men on their fields of labor and bear a hand with them in the conflict against the powers of darkness.

My second meeting was in the Swedish Evangelical Lutheran church, Rev. H. O. Lindeblad pastor. The evening was dark and the rain fell fast, but in spite of every obstacle there was a large and orderly audience, composed of young and middle-aged men, with perhaps seventy-five ladies who had courage to "stand the storm." There had been no bills distributed, or notice in the papers, simply an announcement from the pulpit on Sabbath, and the pastor tells me he was greatly surprised at seeing so large a number of the secretists, not accustomed to attend at his church, coming in. The wonder was how they found it out. A number of Odd fellows came forward after the benediction to make inquiry, and the man who seemed leader among them said he had taken eight degrees. I replied, "You reckon the iniatory degree and degree of Rebeka, I suppose," to which he assented.

One gentlemen said: "The secret societies are doing more good in this town than the churches." I asked, "Are you a believer in the Bible?" He replied, "Yes, and would like to be a Lutheran, but they won't take me in because I belong to the lodge." "Then," said I, "you think this town could better dispense with the church and their Sabbath, and prayer services, than with their lodges and their secret night meetings, from which the larger part of your population are excluded?" He then modified his first statement by saying, "I mean pecuniary advantages." I then endeavored to show him how the secret lodges are making paupers for the church and state to take care of, while the influence of the church is to prevent panperism and crime, and so we parted.

My third service was with Bro. Lindeblad, and although the weather continued unfavorable, I was gratified to meet a full house promptly at 7:30. On the previous evening we left "John" kneeling at the altar where he took his first oath and fortunately found him again just where we parted from him the night before. The crowd were anxious to see the poor fellow through, if possible, and so by the aid of my charts we went on and down the slimy way for an hour and a half, when we had reached the "Royal Arch," and I proposed to stay further proceedings, but cries of "Go on," coming from all quarters, and the pastor assenting, we spent another half hour under the "Living Arch," along the "Rough and Rugged road" between Bablyon and Jerusalem, and left poor John suspended in the "vault" with the rope seven times around his body. The pastor spoke a few well-chosen words of commendation and invited all to extend the notice and return with their friends to see how poor John got through, and the services closed with the benediction.

There was no diminution in numbers or apparent lack of interest at my fourth lecture last evening, though condition of streets and weather were very little improved. This is certainly a very important center, and in strengthening, encouraging and instructing those gathered in and about this fountain of knowledge a wide field is reached. The enemy has not overlooked this point, and in the interests of his "Grand Lodge" below has established, I am told, not less than fourteen secret mutual protective benefit insurance lodges among the industrial and operative classes gathered here. So far I have dealt mostly with Freemasonry, with occasional reference to the minor orders, but have promised, D. V., to return and devote a few evenings to the minor orders included in the one "Secret Empire." The college and the Evangelical Swedish Lutheran church include the less as well as the greater in their testimony, refusing church fellowship to all adherents of secret orders.

The Swedish Lutheran church here is the largest and finest in the city. It has an audience room 100 by 58 feet, and a seating capacity of about 1,200. Its present membership is 1,135 and the Sabbath school averages near 300. The pastor's salary is $1,000, the organ cost $2,800, and the whole property belonging to the church, including the parsonage, is valued at $40,000. The congregation maintain a school in the Swedish language eight months in the year, which has an attendance at present of 110 pupils. Since this church, with all its auxiliary agencies, takes open and decided measures against all secret societies, it should have honorable recognition among the factors in the great struggle against the lodge power. In this manufacturing town it is exerting an untold influence for good, and is, so far as I can learn, the only Christian body that rebukes the impudent and brazen-faced rival of the Bride of Christ.

The W. C. T. U. have placed barrels containing "Ice Water, Free," at convenient distances along the principal streets, which is certainly to be commended, but I hear of no warning voice from these friends of the poor and out-cast against the night lodges that are ruining more homes, making more drunkards, and sending more souls to perdition, than they are saving by all their ingenious methods. Why not attack and remove the strongest bulwark of the dram-shop, and then the drink demon and his victims will disappear. Ice water may relieve the drunkard's thirst, but it will never dry up the fountain so long as the lodge separates households and leads its victims to altars of Christless pagan worships.

NEW HAMPSHIRE NOTES.

New Market, N. H., Oct. 1, 1885.

The New Hampshire Woman's Christian Temperance Union held its annual meeting at Great Falls, Sept. 29-30. It was a very enthusiastic and successful convention. Miss Anna Gordon, of Illinois (Miss Willard's armor-bearer), addressed 500 temperance children, who entered the church in a body in a very happy manner. The church was crowded to hear President Frances E. Willard. She said they had dealt directly with the saloon-keepers and legislatures, with only partial success, and now they propose to appeal to the people, to the voters. She said three-fourths of the church members were women, owing to the demoralizing effect of liquor on men. She triumphantly vindicated St. John, and plead for political action and woman suffrage. No doubt the saloon keeps men out of the church, but there are many total abstainers who reject Christ through the subtle influence of false lodge worship. Among the results of the past year's work was noted the laws forbidding the sale of tobacco to minors, condemning impure literature, and enforcing temperance teaching in all our common schools. As delegate from the N. H. Christian Association, I was invited to address the convention, and was received with much applause. A delegate was appointed to represent the N. H. W. C. T. U. at our convention, to be held at East Rochester Oct. 27-8-9. I presented to the ladies of the convention fifty copies of the October Christian Witness, and two messengers were appointed to distribute them among the delegates. Friends in neighboring states are cordially invited to attend our annual meeting at East Rochester. Elder H. L. Hastings, of Boston, and Rev. Isaac Hyatt, a seceding Freemason of Gilford Village, are expected among our speakers.

CITY WORK.

Chicago, October 2, 1885.

Since my last report I have been working largely in the suburbs of this city. On Sabbath evening I had the pleasure of addressing a goodly number in the Free Methodist Church, on the south side, on 53d street.

I spoke somewhat at length, contrasting the religions of the lodge and the Bible. The friends here are awake to the important questions of the day. Many of them expressed a renewed interest in our work. I was told that at least two Masons were present, and were much exercised.

On Monday, Bro. Hillegonds, of Englewood, kindly accompanied me in calling on many of the pastors of that place. We found here, as almost everywhere, many who thought more of keeping harmony in their churches, than of finding out and opposing popular sins. Some, however, were evidently glad to receive light on the subject. Rev. Elsdon, pastor of the Baptist church, said he would like to know more of our work. He will consult with the trustees and write us the result. We called on some friends and secured their subscriptions to the Cynosure. Mr. Grossman, who has for years been an advocate of our reform, kindly entertained me.

After a good night's rest, Bro. H. and myself started for South Holland. Stopping at Roseland, we called on Rev. B. VanEss, pastor of the Dutch Reformed church at that place. He assured us of his loyalty to the cause of light, and said his church would assist what they could to maintain it. Our next stop was at the home of Rev. Mr. Moerdyk, of South Holland, known to many readers of the Cynosure as an able advocate of our principles. After making partial arrangements for a lecture, we visited several of his leading members. We found all, like their pastor, interested in our work. Some expressed their interest by subscribing for our paper. My visit at the home of my former classmate, Mr. E. R. Worrell, who is teaching school at Thornton, was very pleasant, and gave a new inspiration for work.

On Wednesday evening, according to appointment, I met the young people of the Second German Baptist church here. Though the night was dark and rainy, there was a fair attendance. That all were interested was evident from the number of questions asked and the attention given. One question was: "If these societies are so bad, why do so many of your enlightened Americans belong to them?" I have agreed to speak to them farther on next Wednesday evening.

It has been my custom when going from place to place to hand tracts to those whom I chance to meet. It is quite amusing sometimes to see people read. While riding in a street car, I handed a tract, describing the initiation, to a lady. She read it through and handed it to her husband, who was standing in the car. The picture of rage portrayed in his countenance as he tore it up is seldom equalled this side the pit.

Another gentleman, supposing, as he expressed it, that the tracts "were good Sunday tracts," said he did not care for any, but when I asked "if he had had traveled east," "Oh yes," said he, and immediately wanted one. W. B. Stoddard.

Dr. Ezra Hunt says: "The dire effect of beer drinking is attracting the attention of the German Government, and the resulting race deterioration is making itself felt. Within two years the government has been seriously perplexed to know what to do with its two thousand tramps and vagabonds."

CORRESPONDENCE.

DANES COMING INTO LINE WITH SWEDES.

Clinton, Iowa.

Editor Christian Cynosure:—The Danish Evangelical Lutheran church in America is a small synod with only thirty-six ministers and about 120 congregations, in thirteen states, but it is growing fast year by year. In the Danish colony in Lincoln county, Minn., more than a hundred families have purchased land this summer, and it is intended to start more colonies as soon as possible. Many members of the Danish congregations are members also of secret societies, in particular of a society called "The Danish Brotherhood;" but the feeling against such societies is getting strong in the Danish church. The convention last year required "The Danish Brotherhood" to give up the oath, the secrecy, the Christ-excluding religion and the blasphemous use of the Lord's prayer in the name of the pagan society; but all in vain. After that time discussion and controversy has been carried on in the Danish papers and congregations. The convention this year in Neenah, Wis. (Sept. 18th and following), discussed the question: What shall we do to prevent the secret societies from seizing our churches? The time is not ripe yet for exclusion of the secret society members, but the ministers and delegates unanimously gave their votes for this resolution:

> The convention regards the spirit of the secret societies as a spirit from the devil. As Christians and children of light we pledge ourselves to combat this spirit and warn against the self-made, Christ-denying religion of these societies."

The agents of N. C. A. undoubtedly will be welcomed in all the Danish churches.

WAY SIDE NOTES.

BOSTON CORBETT ON THE LODGE.

Beloit, Kan., Sept. 28, 1885.

Editor Cynosure.—During the last two weeks I have preached on National Reform from the pulpits of Bros. J. R. Latimer and J. M. McKitrick, near Idana, Clay county, Kansas, and Bros. S. M. Stevenson and W. I. Brookes. Each of these pastors is right on the anti-secret, as well as on the National Reform issue, and kindly arranged for me to lecture as well as preach several evenings in the bounds of their congregations. All these points were in the country except Bro. Brookes's church in Miltonvale, where I held three meetings. With a full-orbed moon and dry roads we had fine audiences. They were mostly the old reliable United Presbyterians and Covenanters. They were prepared to take down anti-secretism in large doses. At most of these meetings I tried to show how secret lodges obstructed temperance and other moral legislation, giving illustrations that came under my own observation.

Last Thursday, while in Concordia, I was introduced to Boston Corbett, who was a sergeant during the war in the 16th New York cavalry, and acquired a national reputation by shooting J. Wilkes Booth, in Garrett's barn, near Bowling Green, Va. The sergeant is a small, active man of fine soldiery bearing, and, I am glad to say, a devoted Christian. He is an interesting speaker, and sometimes preaches in the Methodist church. He is strongly opposed to secret societies, and refuses for this reason to have anything to do with the G. A. R. He is called a crank, and lives quite a retired life on a farm near Concordia, and receives a pension. He never hesitates to speak out against secretism. A few years ago, while at a soldier's reunion in Topeka, he was called out for a speech amidst great cheering. The speaker preceeding him had said, that the next war in this country would be against Romanism. Mr. Corbett went on to say that there was more danger of a war on the secret society question. But the chairman soon called him down, saying they had no time to listen to crankism. I think Bro. Corbett could easily be enlisted in the anti-secret work, and would make an earnest and efficient speaker.

There is one Cynosure subscriber in Beloit, a noble anti-secret worker, Mrs. L. T. McKune. Her doors are open to every weary reform pilgrim. For several years she has held up the banner alone in this town, where the lodges seem to control everything—where a reformer would be arrested for speaking on the street, while a vender of patent medicine or a politician could speak undisturbed. Sister McKune ventured sometime ago to enquire through the Cynosure about a colored minister, Bro. Suggs, who had been arrested on a false charge, because, as was supposed, he was speaking against Masonry. Her note in the Cynosure came under the eye of the editor of the Beloit Courier which was a signal for a severe attack upon her and the cause.

I have lectures arranged for more than two weeks in the vicinity of Beloit and Concordia. The communities to which I find the easiest access, are the United Presbyterian, Wesleyan Methodist, United Brethren, and Covenanter. They are usually to be found in the rural districts, on account of the unpopular truth they advocate. But it is important to cultivate these fields, because only one-fifth of our population live in cities, and the day is coming when the country boys must take care of the city boys.

MR. HASTINGS AND THE GOOD TEMPLARS.

Wheaton College, Sept. 24, 1885.

Dear Cynosure:—The cool, unimpassioned listener in the pew is quite as apt to know the exact weight and emphasis of the words of the impassioned orator, as he himself is. The reference of Mr. Hastings to the pope was made in no such apologetic way as he would have people think, but in glowing eulogy, both of Mr. Finch and of the order of which he is the head. If it meant anything, it meant that the striking resemblance between that order and its head, and the church of Rome and its head, was in some way creditable to the order. Now, if it be true that the Papacy is the great apostasy, is it not true that this one feature of it, so distinctly foreshadowed in Scripture, that in all the world it has but one head that raises itself "above all that is called God and worshiped," is the most evident token of the same, and the one given by which we should know that apostasy when it made its appearance? If this be so, may we not fairly conclude that whatever movement appears among men that has, or claims to have, this one striking feature, has, or, claims to have, the token that most clearly marks it as a part of the great apostasy? It is well known that such is the claim of Freemasonry, and the last hatched of its multitudinous brood.

This is not the only indication that the secret orders are a part of the anti-Christ predicted in Scripture. The careful student will find many of them. Indeed, one need not look farther than Mr. Hastings's article to find one, at least. He speaks of the "altar" of the Good Templars' lodge. Now, an altar is a part of a religion. It had an outward form and an outward use in the Jewish church, to wit, for sacrificial use. In the spiritual church it has no outward form nor outward use, and the fact that the Romish church retains it is another evidence that she is part, at least, of the great apostasy. That Freemasonry and the secret orders retain it whether in outward form or in spiritual significance clearly marks them as anti-Christian.

I submit that the cases of the lodge and the church supposed are only apparently, and not really parallel; for the church members, if approached on the subject, would, if they were honest, admit they were wrong and ought to repent; if they did not they would not deserve to be, and would not be regarded as Christians; but Good Templars, in the case of the county organization referred in New York (and I was told that the same was true in Chicago, while on my way to Lake Bluff, by a speaking member of the order there, and the same is known to be true in many other places), will not, at least in these places, even so much as allow what we are told is one of their two fundamental principles to be discussed in their meetings. If "by their fruits ye shall know them" is a good rule to judge by, and if prohibition is good fruit, the Good Templar tree cannot be a very good tree; thus far it has produced more crab apples than pippins. Furthermore much of the good fruit that it appears to bring forth is not its own, as in the case of the writer himself, who, I understand, was a prohibitionist before he was a Good Templar.

The criticism of the order was only such as the circumstances seemed to call for, and did not at all state the worst objections to it.

When Freemasonry, in that act revealing another striking feature of the great, persecuting anti-Christ of Rome, struck down the life of a citizen of the Empire State, and caused its members, many of whom were professed Christians and ministers, to perjure themselves to shield the criminals who were its tools to do the deed, the excitement that arose caused 45,000 out of 50,000 to leave their lodges in the North, and caused most of the lodges to die; but slavery, a twin institution of despotism in the South did not allow free discussion, and hence saved its life there.

After a new generation came on the stage, the effort began to call back to life this power in the State that assumed the prerogative of the State. For this purpose the Odd-fellows were organized by Freemasons, and then the principles of temperance becoming popular, to rehabilitate still more rapidly Freemasonry in the public confidence, advantage was taken of this popularity to reorganize the temperance cause under forms of secrecy more or less Masonic, and thus destroy the aversion to secrecy that was still in the public mind, charmed with the working of this new device of the adversary, enthusiastic Masons sometimes called these new stepping stones to their order the Sunday schools of the lodge.

Right well they performed their mission. Those lecturers went forth, many of them, with more zeal to promote "our order" than the temperance cause. One of them, upon a summons of the master of the Masonic lodge in our town, organized a lodge to try to break down the rule in Wheaton College against students attending lodge meetings in term time. He gave out notices of his meetings that some of the lodge minnions had the impudence to post in the College hall, and said publicly, "Let the students come and join us, and if the College dares to deal with them, we will publish them to the ends of the earth, and they will have to shut their doors,"—a threat which they proceeded to put into execution, publishing everything but the truth about the case. When the College suspended three of its number who were thus caused to rebel against its rightful authority, a mandamus was sued out, seeking to compel them to take back their contumacious students. The College was put to the expense of defending itself in the circuit and in the supreme courts, in both of which its course was entirely vindicated.

At one time a large majority of the voting members of this lodge voted for license.

In the villages and country places there was not material enough to run the open and the secret organizations, and in the larger places many of the workers were swept along in the current into the new order of things, thus discouraging and killing off the old open societies. In far the larger portion of the country these new orders soon died out, but in the villages and cities stealthily like a pestilence the Masonic or Odd-fellows lodge came in their place.

While I concede to my brother Hastings all honesty of purpose, and all he claims of success for his personal labors for the cause of temperance, I still do not think that they prove the Templars to be a good institution. Honest efforts to promote a good cause will promote that cause, however much the person putting them forth may be in error in other matters. And the fact that so good a man does not see anything wrong in the order only proves that if one wants to see what is in a meal bag he ought not to put his head in it, and perhaps furnishes another example of the truth of that Scripture which says, "How can ye believe that receive honor one of another, and seek not the honor that comes from God only."

I have given you one example, which might be multiplied indefinitely, of the persecuting power of Masonry, which is one of the ear-marks of anti-Christ. I could give many, showing that the secret temperance orders are not destitute of the same. I will only refer to one—the murderous mob that sought to kill President C. A. Blanchard in Vineland, N. J., because he depicted the moral dangers made possible by promiscuous night meetings of the sexes under the peculiar conditions offered by the lodge. In less than a year the very evil depicted happened to that community, and the head of the lodge was the offender.

In one respect Bro. Hastings is far in advance of members of the secret orders, as I have found them. He does not feel under obligation to defend the whole mongrel pack of secret lodges, orders, camps and whatever else they may call themselves. If he really believes some of them wrong, and sets himself to oppose them, perhaps he may see the weakness and inconsistency of his position.

Men to be permanently reformed and benefited must have new hearts, but he whose sole prerogative it is to give them, said, "in secret have I said nothing. O. F. LUMRY.

JEWETT, HASTINGS, SECRECY.

ARCADE, N. Y.

Experience has its value as an instructor. Having been in its school for nearly seventy-six years, and in the school of Christ as an earnest and willing pupil for about sixty-two and a half years, I am desirous to impart for the benefit of my fellows, and to the end that God may be glorified. In the Cynosure for Sept. 24th may be seen a quotation from the writings of Charles Jewett, and in the same paper a communication from Samuel D. Hastings. These men seem, both of them, to be Christian in character and in profession: candid and honest in the presentation of their views. One opposes, the other favors close organization. With all due deference, I may say that Mr. Jewett was not working consistently with his own ideas of what was for the best, when he worked "for years with and for Sons of Temperance and Good Templars," "believing" at the time as he says, "all the while, that open societies would serve our purpose better."

As I was a humble co-worker in the war against alcohol before 1840, I can, from my own personal observation, corroborate the testimony that Mr. Jewett gives, that "unbrotherly strifes for offices and honors, were unknown in the open organizations, absolutely unknown."

Suffer personal allusions, as I desire that others may be profited in view of my experience. I think it was in New York city, and by eight Freemasons and eight Odd-fellows, that the order of the Sons of Temperance was begotten many years since. There is a significance in the composition of this fatherhood which it is well we should study in the light of of the aphorism "Like father, like son." I think it was within ten days of birth of this child that I was solicited to become a co-heir or rather a co-pecuniary contributor of myself and purse, the latter being the most desired. I did not then know of the character of its parentage, but as I was a Christian I searched to find if my Master was at its head. Not finding him there, I declined to enlist.

Years after, I think it was about the year 1846 or a little later, and while residing at Cuba, in this State, I was surrounded by circumstances somewhat as were those of my brother Hastings, at Geneva, Wis., except that I think it very likely that the urgency of my joining was stronger than his. These were the circumstances. I was living in the very center of the village and was one of a very few pronounced temperance men; I had in charge the postoffice of the place and was, of course, well known. Two public liquor houses stood very near the postoffice, from the bars of which liquor flowed rampantly. There came a time when, in one of the barrooms, some dozen or so drinkers were together when one of their number dared the others to join him in shutting down the gate against all intoxicants. His companions all of them accepted the challenge and the alcohol family was banished from their homes.

Then there arose among them a demand for a society of the Sons of Temperance. Knowing me to be a temperance man, they applied to me to lead off in a move to establish an order. Here was a temptation to comply for the sake of saving these men and gathering others as brands from the burning. I halted and reconsidered my former decision and determined that, for the sake of saving these men and others, I would, could I upon review see it to be right, procede to help organize. I examined the constitution, looked up to the hills from whence wisdom and direction must come from him who sitteth in the heavens. The result was that I found no precedent, no sanction and no permit whatever, either from the Spirit or the Word, to operate through or by any such-like, sought-out human invention.

Had my brother Hastings, when between two opinions as to joining, sought out and been governed by the example and teachings of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and the whole force and genius of an open Gospel, I hesitate not to affirm that he would have done as I did, decline to ignore Christ's plan of operation which was open to the world. Trappings, gewgaws, high sounding and grand titles illy become the followers of the meek and lowly Jesus.

When will men, especially Christians, learn that in relation to Christ Jesus, "there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved?" R. W. LYMAN.

THE WARRING OF THE ELEMENTS IN SOUTH-WESTERN MISSOURI.

DADEVILLE, MO.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—If you please let it be remembered, that in February last, when Bro. Richards of Ft. Scott, lectured in our village against the lodge, the Cumberland Presbyterian minister, who is a Mason, was induced to attend the lecture, and was so affected by the power of truth that he was the subject of general remark, for perhaps some weeks thereafter. But, alas! in this, as in innumerable similar instances, the evil spirit, after wandering hither and thither, returns to his house, at once re-enters and holds undisputed possession.

At the close of the above lecture, Bro. Richards approached this preacher, and, in his affectionate manner, putting his arm around him, said, "I hope I have not offended you, Bro. R———, in my plain presentation of the truth, to-night. God knows I love you, and I want you to pray for me." "Why no, Bro. Richards," responded the convulsed man, "I love you, and want you to pray for me." This occurred on the 2nd of February last, in Dadeville, Mo. But, lo! upon these very same streets, this same man, a short time since, is driven to such a state of desperation, simply by the truth being brought to bear upon his exceedingly inconsistent position, that he exclaims aloud, that that man Richards, in his lecture upon the occasion referred to, said and uttered things that he knew to be false when he stated them; forgetting evidently that he, at that very time, endorsed him as a brother beloved!

But I have only revealed one-half of this heart-sickening picture. This same poor man, preacher and all as he is, went on to publicly declare that Freemasonry laid no claims to be a system of religion in any sense of the word, whatsoever. But unfortunate for him again, within a very short time indeed, after the above denuneiations, a notoriously wicked Mason in our town is called to lie down and die. Without the least sign of repentanee, whatever, but with execration almost to the latest breath, he passes into eternity. Now, what are the facts in the case? Simply, the Masons, as is their custom, with a good minister of the Christian order, at their head, proceed to bury their deceased brother. This they do in the most public and unequivocal manner. They send him direct from the lodge below, to "the Grand Lodge above," the declarations and denuneiations of our good brother minister to the contrary notwithstanding.

Now, look at it, one professed minister of Jesus Christ denies in to to all religious claims or pretensions of the order, and that, too, in the very face of the best accredited authors of which they boast; while another, better established I presume, comes out boldly, sustains his order and publicly officiates in the very rites which his fellow minister, only a few weeks before, had so emphatically denied. Which is a perishing world to believe?

This last minister the very next day after the funeral, gravely ascends his pulpit, and declares that "There is none other name under heaven, given among men, whereby we must be saved," except that of Jesus Christ. But only yesterday this name was entirely ignored. What are we to do, I ask, under such a state of things? What is to be the result of such teaching? Is it strange that infidelity and all sorts of skepticism are emboldened to come to the front? Were it not that there is a Power greater than man, the truly pious heart must faint. But, thank God, these things have an end. Error will not always triumph. One grand, good effect is already being realized; that is a duped people are beginning to think, examine, and MOVE. Every thing has its effect. May God hasten the day when the people will be disenthralled; truth triumph, and our blessed Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ be fully enthroned. Bro. Love, of Osceola, Mo., gave us, recently, two telling lectures against the lodge. Yours for the war, J. W. THOMPSON.

FOURTH QUARTER.

STUDIES IN THE KINGS AND PROPHETS.

LESSON III. Oct. 18, 1885.—Jehu's false zeal. 2 Kings 10: 15-31.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly. Ps. 1: 1.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

COMMENTS ON THE LESSON BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. Unprincipled and ambitious men are always eager to gain the sanction of God's people in their plans and enterprises. vs. 15–17. Jehu, as the sequel shows, was actuated by that unhallowed zeal which seeks to make religion a stepping-stone for its own selfish ambition. His greeting to Jehonodab is a proof of his self-righteous spirit. True piety is humble and more conscious of its failings and shortcomings than of its own goodness. Jehu plainly went beyond his commission. He had received no command to kill the king of Judah or to murder forty and two of his near relatives in cold blood, and the terrible completeness with which he did the work of exterminating the idolotrous house of Ahab was less from righteous indignation at the abominations they practiced than the fear and hatred which a usurper would naturally feel towards the dethroned dynasty. But Jehu is only the representation of a large class who serve themselves and imagine they are serving God. There was never a popular evil, or an unholy traffic in vice which has not in some way sought, and too often gained, the sanction of the church. Every form of sin, even to murder and adultery, could be freely practiced in the Middle Ages by the payment of a certain sum of money into the papal coffers. Bad men always find a Jehonodab to approve their iniquities. The saloon in our own day tries to shield itself behind a few isolated Bible texts, and Masonry points to lodge ministers as a proof that it is a good thing, when in reality it only proves that the church is in a terrible state of delusion. If the Bible, instead of the conduct or opinions of men, however exalted their standing in the church or the community, had always been the authority by which to judge the right or wrong of an institution or a custom, much sin and misery might have been saved the world.

2. Men may destroy Baal in one form, only to worship him in another. vs. 18–23. The very man who by a hypocritical stratagem compasses the wholesale destruction of the priests of Baal, himself rears again the golden calves of Jeroboam!—Baal worship in another form, less outwardly gross, but still Baal worship. The strongest test by which a reformer ean try the purity of his zeal is by the simple question, Do I hate all evil? That is a spurious reform which would banish one form of sin from the land while it harbors and defends another. Prohibitionists who are for destroying the saloon while they court the lodge commit a fatal mistake. Baal has many forms. To destroy him in one may only he, like Jehu, to enthrone him in another.

LIGHT FROM THE WORD.

What is a characteristic of true piety? 1 Cor. 13: 4. l. c. Must national, like individual, reform be thorough to win God's approval? 1 Sam. 15: 22.

Jehu was a great soldier, a man of intense energy, of quiek wit, of positive opinions, and decisive action. But he was cruel, impulsive, treacherous, ambitious, unscrupulous, boastful, and self-seeking. "It is the driving of Jehu, for he driveth furiously;" this is the best memorial that will remain of him who has let his zeal beeome his master when it was meant to be his servant, and who has counted it a pleasure instead of a hard neeessity to destroy.—Maurice. He is exactly one of those men whom we are compelled to recognize, not for what is good or great in themselves, but as instruments for destroying evil and preparing the way for good, such as Augustus Cæsar at Rome, Sultan Mahmoud II. in Turkey. He showed inscrutable secrecy and reserve in carrying out his plans; a union of cold, remorseless tenacity with occasional bursts of furious, wayward, almost fanatical zeal.—Stanley.

"Howbeit from the sins of Jeroboam . . . Jehu departed not." He was brought up under the worship of the golden ealves, so that this did not seem so evil in his eyes. For this worship, see 1 Kings 12: 26–33, Lesson II., Third Quar. And as this worship was really the worship of Jehovah, though in an unlawful manner, Jehu probably did not feel the same obligation to suppress it that he had felt to destroy the worship of Baal. Besides, there were political reasons for preserving the worship established by Jeroboam which Jehu felt that he could not disregard. This worship kept the people from going to Jerusalem to worship and therefore was a means of keeping the kingdoms of Israel and Judah scparate.—Todd. He had religious feeling enough and patriotism enough to detest the utterly debasing Astarte worship; but the pure worship of Jehovah was altogether beyond and ahove him.—Cook.

THE GOOD ELEMENTS IN JEHU'S ZEAL. (1) It was right to have zeal. (2) It aecomplished a good work for God's kingdom. (3) It was patriotie, and saved his country. (4) It was intense. (5) It was effective, and led to decisive and energetic measures. (6) It received temporal sueeess and temporal rewards.

THE BAD ELEMENTS IN JEHU'S ZEAL. (1) It was selfish, and not for God. (2) It was eruel. (3) It was boastful and proud. (4) It was partial, doing that whieh was agrceable and for his advantage, hut not the whole will of God. (5) It employed bad methods, falsehood, hypocrisy, treachery, in accomplishing its ends. (6) It was negative, destroying the evil, but not building up the good. (7) It did not grow out of a sincere heart devoted to God aud the good of his fellow-men. (8) It failed of true spiritual success and reward.—Peloubet.

A Wonderful Woman, A Wonderful Life, AND A Wonderful Book.

Laura S. Haviland is a quiet, gentle, unassuming Quaker woman, 76 years of age, yet vigorous, who has had a remarkable career of usefulness, and has now given to the world a remarkable history of her "Life Work" as a teacher, at an early day, of the colored refugees in Canada and in Michigan, and in other States, as a traveler down South in the guise of a "berry picker," helping out into freedom many slaves; as a nurse and preacher to the sufferers in hospitals during the war; and with Gov. St. John and Elizabeth Comstock, relieving the destitute and suffering refugees in Kansas, etc.

Her book is neither fiction nor founded on fiction, but is an interesting narration of facts of a most thrilling character, as every one will find and testify who will get and read her book, now on sale at the Cynosure office, 221 W. Madison St., Chicago, Ill. Price, cloth, $1,75; half Russia, $2.25.

AMERICAN PLATFORM.

ADOPTED AT CHICAGO, JUNE 20, 1884.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled condition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clannishness by which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile bands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruption, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; and having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and believing the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, both inevitable and indispensable:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, believing with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; believing in the Christian marriage, and not in Mormonism; believing in the religious democracy of the New Testament, and not in the despotism of the lodge; believing, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, not in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we abhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscience by human laws and penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly believe that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike foes to human liberty and welfare. We further most firmly believe that a government without God has none but lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a mere usurpation, we regard all religions and worships invented by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as mere swindling impositions and cheats. We believe in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly believe that the bravery and blood of our soldiers have bought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will be just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised by the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon be not only echoed by their voices, but sustained by their votes.

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following, as containing a brief synopsis of the principles of our government, by which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.
2. That the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.
3. That God requires, and man needs a Sabbath.
4. We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.
5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.
6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to benefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.
7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punishment of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.
8. We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage.
9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be preserved inviolate, and the same equality should be extended to Indians and Chinamen.
10. That international differences should be settled by arbitration.
11. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.
12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.
13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.
14. That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.
15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1885.

THE GENERAL CONVENTION OF CHURCHES AGAINST THE LODGE.

Such a convention was suggested at the last N. C. A. annual meeting. It was endorsed by a United Brethren convention, which appointed Hon. Halleck Floyd, Dr. L. Davis, and Rev. M. McNew a committee to correspond with like committees, to agree:

First, on the make up of the convention: and second, on the time, place and programme. Prominent men in the Presbyterian, Congregational, and several German and Swedish churches have warmly endorsed the plan: and the editors of the Wesleyan and Free Methodist, besides our own papers at Washington, Birmingham and Blanchard, Iowa, have given their sanction, and the White Water United Brethren conference with the Wesleyan conferences of Indiana and Illinois, have taken time by the forelock and chosen ten delegates, ministers and laymen, to attend the convention when called.

The conception which originated the idea of a convention was manifold:

1. A truly national religious convention which shall unite the testimoney of several hundred thousand Christian people, besides Catholics, who are, denominationally and openly committed against the secret "orders;" in the hope of enlisting a million more, who want nothing but information to enable them to see that "the lodges are disintegrating the churches."

2. In the further hope, also, of aiding churches, like the United Brethren, which are in death-grapple with the lodge. The sainted Bishop Edwards, sitting with the Cynosure editor on a pile of boards in a Chicago lumber yard, said, with deep emotion: "The National Christian Association was not born an hour too soon to save our church. And further, a truly National Convention of anti-secrecy churches and representative men will work mightily in aid of the pastors of colored churches in the South, who have discovered that their secret orders are swallowing their churches as alligators swallow rabbits, and like Brinckley and Countee, are struggling to rescue them.

3. By such a national convention to erect a platform on which Rev. Joseph Cook may stand to lecture in Boston, and by his printed lectures, reach thinking religionists from Florida to Alaska.

4. And these ends accomplished, by their means to rescue the temperance cause from the grip of the lodge; and in 1888 drive secretly forsworn men from the arena of American politics.

To achieve these grand objects, measures should be set on foot at once. The religious convention should meet so early in the fall or winter, now at hand, as to give Mr. Cook ample time to set the lodge in its true light before the religious world before his Boston lecture term closes: and as such a convention should be preceded by the most ample discussion: perhaps a preliminary consultation should be had at Dayton, Syracuse, Worcester, or some such place, by committees, etc., to agree on preliminaries and discuss the call. Will Hon. Halleck Floyd of Dublin, Indiana, chairman of the first committee appointed, give us the mind of his committee on this whole subject? And will the Christian Statesman, and the Instructor, of Philadelphia, the American, the Free Press, and Blanchard Record, Iowa, the Wesleyan, Free Methodist, United Presbyterian, Sandy Lake News and other presses opposed to the lodge, Lutheran, Baptist, Friend, etc., etc., give this article an insertion and give us their advice. Articles carefully written on the subject will be welcomed by the Cynosure.

THE LONDON AGITATION AND THE LODGE IN PROPHECY.

And I saw three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet. For they are the spirits of devils, working miracles which go forth unto the kings of the earth.—Rev. 16: 13, 14.

The Revelation is made up of a series of prophetic photographs, or symbolic pictures of providences, down to the close of time:

"Coming events cast their shadows before," and these are of them. Mark, they are not frogs, but "unclean spirits like frogs," living in church and world, as frogs in air and water; issuing from mouths, i. e., teaching forces,—from three mouths, to wit, Satan's, the beast's or false worship, and the false prophet's or the Mormonism of all ages, the three mightiest antagonists to God and goodness now on earth. And the three are unclean spirits.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, Bishop of London, Samuel Morley and Mr. Reid, members of Parliament, and Cardinal Manning, were appointed by the Pall Mall Gazette editor to report on the uncleanness of British aristocracy. Cardinal Manning reports for this commission in the North American Review for October. He says:

"We decided from the first to exclude any inquiry into charges against particular men, or classes of men."

And then adds:

"After carefully sifting the evidence . . . we are satisfied that the statements in the Pall Mall Gazette are substantially correct."

"The charges" referred to by the Cardinal, are, in substance, what have been published throughout England and the United States, namely that an extensive slave-trade was kept up of white girls of tender age, in the city of London, both for home and foreign market; that the ordinary commission on these human victims is from fifty to one hundred dollars; that experienced villains court simple-hearted peasant girls, or children of farmers, doctors, and poor clergymen, sometimes with, and sometimes without the consent of parents; that the children sometimes are ignorant of their destiny, and are turned into rooms where screams are unavailing; and that the streets of London are peopled by night-walking, haggard young wretches, turned out, after being passed through the mills of prostitution; and that the wealthier classes, notably the English aristocracy, are the bidders in these shambles of lust. Cardinal Manning admits that London, which represents more money than the world besides, with 4,000,000 people, may be sunk lower in this gulf of Sodom-ism than the United States: but Elizabeth Blackwell after forty years successful medical practice, avers that "Philadelphia and New York contain deeper horrors than London."

The history of the Pall Mall Gazette investigations is given in this number of the Cynosure by our special and valued contributor Rev. John Boyes, of Grimsby, England, and by a portion of Cardinal Manning's North American Review article. It appears that some five years since the escaping flames from this lower hell of society alarmed the British public, and started in Parliament the Criminal Law Amendment Bill, which dragged its slow length along through five years of languid legislation until this Pall Mall Gazette denonement. The editor applied himself to distinguished friends of that bill, archbishops, bishops, and others of the above named commission; and, having secured their moral protection, proceeded to gather facts from heads of hospitals, houses of refuge and other reputable people, and compared them with the evidence of procurers, paramours, broken-down brothel-keepers professing reform, who for money, and promised immunity were willing to recite the history of their crimes. Such is this London agitation.

ITS RELATION TO THE LODGE.

Throughout the Bible history false worships and whoredom are twins inseparable; and the world-hatred of the Hebrew nation turned chiefly perhaps on the fact that their laws punished adultery with death. The lodge omitting Father, Son and Holy Ghost, has no system of right and wrong. It does not protect female virtue, but only the female relations of Masons. Nor is it to be overlooked that the Prince of Wales is, at once, head of the British aristocracy, and head of British Masons; and that these are the chief purchasers in this slave-mart of prostitution, whose partial unveiling is now moving England and the United States. The brothel system and the lodge system are both alike secret; and both alike Christless: and the Salvation Army may clamor and clang their tambourreens against this girl traffic, but while they are silent concerning the lodge their testimony will be but as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal.

The "secret orders" of the lodge differ from "orders of nobility" only as images differ from their objects. In the old palace yard, over against the new Buckingham Palace, the lodge is still shown where the Duke of York shot his footman for objecting to his intimacy with his wife; and the law took no notice of the murder. As the "Image of the Beast" exercised all the power of the beast itself, so the lodge-shams of "titled orders" satisfy the devil and answer his dark purposes as well as the "orders of nobility," which our fathers excluded by our Constitutions, Federal and State, as the certain bane of the Republic. An "order" of men gives standing to its members without requiring them to be virtuous and screens crime and infamy from loathing. It thus strangles virtue with one hand and shields vice with the other: and, as our war was a failure till it struck slavery, so the outcry against making merchandize of women and girls, whether in Salt Lake or London, will amount to nothing till it strikes the lodge which shelters both.

WHO ABOLISHED SLAVERY?

Senator George F. Hoar has made a two hours' political speech, in which he treated the ex-slaves as wards of the Republican party, and said the Republicans would insist on their having their rights. The Chicago Times scouts the claim of the Republicans to the honor of abolishing slavery, and recalls the fact that the Republican leaders avowed, over again, and constantly, that they fought only against secession, and that slavery was not in the issue. The Democrats lay no claim to the abolition. They reproached the Republicans as "black abolitionists," as a political war-club. Both these parties deny the abolitionists all credit for the abolition. Who, then, did abolish it? All now agree that the abolition was a glorious consummation, and the Fourth of July will henceforth shout the praises of a country without king or slave. And all know that if some people had not endured unpopularity, scorn, and mob violence in his behalf, the slave would to-day be wearing his chains. Who abolished slavery?

HUMAN FEROCITY.

Those who see nothing supernatural in the secret lodge system have a very imperfect understanding of it. The more than savage ferocity, the murder-spirit of the lodge springs from the desire to wrest from Christ the worship and fealty of this globe, and the bitterness is proportioned to the vastness of the stake.

The East Boston, Mass., Advocate comes to us with the following editorial, which explains itself. It verifies and illustrates the Scriptures: "The wicked hateth the just, and gnasheth upon him with his teeth."

"In view of the large fraternity existing among the members of the various secret organizations of the land and the vast amount of good accomplished through their instrumentality (which result must be apparent to every observer) it is rare to hear a person speak lightly or disparagingly of such orders. Occasionally, however, one may be found who has something to say against secret organizations; but the general opinion concerning such a man is, that he is too mean and too selfish to invest in anything to benefit his fellowmen, or, that he is so contemptible as to have been refused admission to orders and therefore feeling aggrieved very naturally vents his spite in tirades against secret orders.

Such a 'crank' made an exhibition of himself in an adult Sunday-school class in East Boston, recently, and received a rebuke, and was taught a lesson which he may not soon forget. Somehow the conversation turned on secret organizations, and the "crank" in great bitterness (he is one of that class who is never happy unless he is miserable) inveighed against all secret societies. In the class was the widow of a member of the Grand Army of the Republic, the members of which had cared for their comrade during his long and painful illness, had closed his eyes in death, and had rendered kind offices to his family since his decease. Fully realizing her deep indebtedness to the Post, and convulsed with grief at the animadversions hurled at secret societies (to which feeling it is not improbable there was added a sense of indignation that there should be allowed to crawl on God's footstool a creature mean enough to be so abusive), the lady for a while could not control her voice sufficiently to reply. Finally, she was able to pay a glowing tribute to the unselfish devotion of the Grand Army towards its comrades, to which was added the corroboration of a member of the organization who was present. Of course the discussion did not last long, but it was of sufficient duration we hope to teach the "crank" a lesson; and while he may not profit by it (for it takes a man with a soul to be generous to his fellow men) he may possibly find an analogy in it between the labors of such organizations and the teachings of Him whom the "crank" professes to serve, and who said: "He who gives a cup of cold water to one of these little ones shall in no way lose his reward."

Between Two Opinions, the new reform story, will go to press in a few days, and our publisher will be ready to fill orders. Those who come first will be first served, and orders sent in early will not be disappointed either in the appearance of the book or its contents. We predict for it a greater sale than any other book of the kind. Send in your orders; $1.00 for cloth bound; 60 cents in paper cover.

GOOD TEMPLARS.

Every child of God has seen Christ; has "beheld the Lamb of God." The effect of that faith-vision never bleaches out. Every Good Templar has worshiped Satan—has done precisely what Satan asked and Christ refused to do. And each act of this Gentile or demon-worship blinds, however trivial the act, as looking religiously at the sun, or kissing the hand to the "moon walking in brightness," or any one of the endless trivialities of the lodge. And each such act leaves a something in the mind which only confession and the blood of Christ can "cleanse," take out.

The late World's Grand Lodge of Good Templars at Toronto gives six hundred and thirty-nine thousand nine hundred and twenty-five members; and what is curious, temperance thrives best where the Templars are the fewest. Iowa has 947, and Pennsylvania 9,324.

Six hundred thousand Good Templars meeting weekly ought to have regenerated our whole country. But a secret society regenerates nothing. Like Achan's gold and garments, they are "accursed things," because used for idolatry. In Wheaton, Ill., the "Worthy(?) Chief Templar" advocated licensing two beer saloons which sold whisky, to get the German vote to remove the court house to Wheaton, and his lodge sustained him! The New York Grand Lodge has just given a two-thirds vote against the St. John Prohibition party, and three hundred delegates left that N. Y. Grand Lodge because it voted against signing liquor licenses. If in the face of such facts men like Samuel D. Hastings do not see that a secret lodge is an "accursed thing," they will be given over to hardness of heart and blindness of mind. Christ alone can cure such blindness. Let us pray that their eyes may be opened.

True, more money can be raised by secret societies than by anything else except popery. And it is also true that there is not conscience enough in this or any other country to expel a moral evil. But if Prohibitionists, whose consciences are not "seared," will stand together on the American platform, they will be a solid, impregnable phalanx, as were the Abolition party, and one other party will vote for anti-secret candidates. Thus again, selfishness will complete what the fear of God begins.

—Our "Secret Empire" history includes an interesting original article this week, as well as a selection. Next week the Masonic account from Hardies' Monitor, 1812, will be found entertaining to our readers.

—Secretary Stoddard sends some of his most hopeful letters this week. All the lecturers will do well to memorize his advice to them. He expected to spend the Sabbath and Monday at Altoona and the day following at Galva, Ill., and will possibly stop two or three days at Elmira, Stark county, among the staunch Scotch Presbyterians.

—Bro. W. B. Stoddard had an important engagement on Tuesday evening in the German Methodist church at 485 North Ashland Avenue. Upon this large and interesting church he hoped to make a strong impression for the truth.

—It is reported that Joseph Cook is engaged in the preparation of a new lecture on "Political Signs of the Times," including Prohibition and Civil Service Reform. No doubt he will find place for a word on American politics also.

The American party in Van Buren county have their war paint on. A full county ticket is in the field. They refuse to support any man for office who has taken secret oaths. They believe in putting one's principles into every day practice.—Amity Index, College Springs, Iowa.

—"Masonic saints" may sound somewhat strange to our readers; but Masonry, as defined by her best authors, proposes to raise her faithful adherents to a sanctity of life which shall fully fit them for the inheritance of the saints in light. Christianity can do no more. True, the methods of the two are extremely different, but this is no impediment with Masons. The knock-down and drag-out process is, in their eyes, of equal virtue with repentance toward God; and the investure with an apron of equal efficacy with faith in the atonement of our Lord Jesus Christ; while the removal of the bandage from the physical sight is considered of equal potency with the illumination of the Holy Ghost. Materialistic, bombastic and buffoonish as is this religion, there are many who appear willing to risk their eternal interests thereon, while there are those who seek to serve in both this and Christianity, and insanely conceive that they may be made compatible with each other.—Free Methodist.

PERSONAL MENTION.

—Among the callers upon the Cynosure within the last week was Bro. S. Simpson of Garfield, Washington Territory, during his first visit to Chicago. Though from a remote part of the country he reports occasional lectures in his vicinity, generally by preachers of the United Brethren church.

—Rev. James Donaldson of Galt, a province of Ontario, visited us also on his way to take charge of a United Presbyterian church near Waterloo, Iowa. his occasional lectures in the vicinity of his home in Canada, have been almost the only public efforts against the lodge in that part of the country.

—Rev. J. D. Gehring, a contributor who is always welcomed by Cynosure readers, spent a day with us in the office and at Wheaton last week on his way home from a northern trip. Bro. Gehring has for years been in very poor health, sometimes even in a critical condition, resulting from wounds and disease contracted in the army. He is connected with Park College near Kansas City, Missouri. This wonderful institution has now over 300 students, and is conducted on a kind of family-manual-labor plan with marked success.

—Bro. Geo. T. Dissette has begun his fall campaign in Illinois round about his home in DuPage county. An appointment at Prospect Park was made last week, but the meeting failed on account of the dark and rainy evening.

—Bro. Thos. K. Doty, of the Christian Harvester, Canton, Ohio, has been engaged also as a corresponding editor of the Banner of Holiness, of Bloomington, Ill., the representative of the Western Holiness Association.

—The trial of Rev. Edward Mathews in Coldwater, Mich., has resulted in his conviction, but he has appealed to a higher court. On account of the lodge prejudice he endeavored to secure a change of venue, but this was not granted, though his request was supported by such evidence as would have carried the point in ordinary cases. His case was managed by his brother, an able lawyer from Detroit, who, with the judge, was surprised at the verdict of the jury. Bro. Mathews is a poor man, and cannot well meet the expense of a prolonged suit. He has had aid to the amount of $100, and doubtless has the sympathy and prayers of all who have read his accounts of the trouble in these columns.

—F. W. A. Riedel, editor of the Investigator, late of Stewartsville, Missouri, reported a disgraceful case of thievery in which two women of that place were detected, in his paper of August 29th. The account, though probably true, was severe and aggravating, and his enemies took advantage of this and raised a mob, driving him from the place. Bro. Riedel has the sympathy of a number of editorial friends and probably of the best people of Stewartville; the lodge, the saloon and petty thieves are glad to get him far away from them. He has located at Osborn, a small town on the Hannibal road and issues again the Investigator regularly. The reformers of Northwestern Missouri might find his paper a useful auxiliary in driving out the lodge.

—A great many people who would otherwise have opposed the G. A. R. consoled them with the thought that their numbers would gradually diminish. But the movement called the Sons of Veterans adds to these organizations the power of perpetuating their existence for another generation. We regret to see it. We honor the soldier and hope to see the patriots who saved the nation ever honored and respected, but we know that these organizations will not lead to this. They are lessening the respect for the old soldier every day, and the coming generation will not honor them as they otherwise would have done, if they had kept their fair names from becoming entangled with the pomp, foolishness and presumption of these societies.—Amity Index.

—Rev. S. M. Hill, formerly missionary among the Mormons, writes, correcting a late note in these columns on the retirement of Judge Hunter from the chief-justiceship of Utah, and the appointment of Judge Powers of Michigan. Bro. Hill lived two years in Salt Lake City, and from a personal knowledge of the facts says the Americans of Utah long tried to have Hunter superseded, since his decisions were evidently modified by Mormon influence, and perhaps bribes. We hope for other information about Mormondon from Bro. Hill.

—At the late meeting of the Executive Committee of the National Reform Association in Philadelphia, Rev. J. H. Lieper was engaged to visit Arkansas in answer to calls from that State for address on religious reform in government. A committee was appointed to prepare and forward a protest to the President and Postmaster General against the desecration of the Sabbath by the new postal delivery mails.

THE SECRET EMPIRE.

MASONIC HISTORY.

[From the American additions to Chambers' Encyclopedia in Library of Universal Knowledge.]

In regard to this whole matter of antiquity, there is nothing in the traditions of the order so exceptionally remarkable as to make any special demand on our credulity. Men have been constituted after the same fashion from the beginning of time; and, given the same motive and the same or a similar environment and like opportunities, they may be assumed to act in the same way. The organization of the craft-guild in northern and central Europe as early as the 7th century is a sufficient illustration of the tendency to association among men, and particularly among the laboring or "craft" classes, to prove this. We know that among the Greeks, and Romans also, such association occurred in various directions, and there is no sound reason for disbelief in the possible combination of the architects and master-builders of Rome in the time of Numa Pompilius, as is claimed by the masons. Whether we are to accept the traditions which point to Solomon's temple, and refer to the times of the ancient Egyptains for the period of the foundation of the order, is a matter not of vital importance; though the same reasoning that answers in the case of Rome is equally sound in that of Egypt. Certainly when one contemplates the pyramids, Memphis, Thebes, Denderah, and the other ruins of marvelous structures built by the Egyptian masons and architects, there is nothing absurd in the supposition that then, as now, associated effort might have been concerned, and that the associations concerned might have organized on some such basis as is involved in the traditional history of freemasonry. The Roman colleges of builders are said to have been created by Numa Pompilius in 715 B. C. In 52 A. D. the corporations of constructors were established in Great Britain. In A. D. 290 Carausius, commander of the Roman fleet, is said to have renewed the ancient constitution and privileges of the Roman colleges, with the view of gaining the favor of the builders, who were a very powerful association: the architect Albanus, sent to Great Britain as an inspector of the constructors or masons, is credited with being the first Christian martyr in Britain, he having been beheaded for preaching the doctrine of Christ.

A congress of masons was held at Basle, in 1563, and at Strasburg in 1564; and in 1607 king James I. of England proclaimed himself protector of the freemasons. In 1663 a general assembly of English masons took place at York, and was presided over by king Charles II. In 1666, at the time of the great fire in London, there were but seven lodges of masons in the city; and in 1703 these had declined to four, though Sir Christopher Wren, the aged grand master, exhibited great zeal in endeavoring to foster the progress, and increase the order. In France, in 1539, Frances I. suspended all the corporations of workmen, and freemasonry became extinguished in that country, not to be revived, until 1721.

It was in the year 1703 that the English masons forming the lodge of St. Paul, having completed the erection of the cathedral, passed the resolution which opened the doors of the order to others than practical masons and builders. This resolution reads as follows: "Resolved, that the privilege of masonry shall no longer be confined to operative masons, but be free to men of all professions, provided that they are regularly approved and initiated into the fraternity." This important decision entirely changed the nature of the society and transformed it into the body as we find it to-day. In 1717 the grand lodge of London was constituted, and put into execution the resolution of 1703: see Masons, Free, ante. In 1864 the three grand lodges of Great Britain controlled 109 provincial grand lodges, with 1597 operative lodges under their jurisdiction, which extended their connections to every part of the globe. Freemasonry was introduced into Denmark in 1783; France, 1721; in Sweden, in 1736; Russia, in 1731; Belgium, 1721; Holland, 1725; Germany, 1737; Switzerland, 1737; Italy, 1729; Portugal, 1735; Spain, 1727. It is claimed that a lodge was established in Halifax, Nova Scotia, as early as 1750, the first in the British dominions in America; but this statement is not fully credited. Of the five provinces which comprise the dominion of Canada, Prince Edward Island alone has its lodges subject to the grand lodges of Great Britain. The first lodge in the New England colonies was opened in Boston in 1733. After the war of independence, grand lodges were organized in all the States.

OUT OF SIGHT.

When the hillsides are flushed with the pink of the laurel,
And green are the meadows where lambs are at play,
'Mid snow-drifts of clover, and blush-blooms of sorrel,
There's beauty broadcast on the fair summer day.
In the distance the mountains are purple and hoary:
And nearer the valleys are sweet in the sun,
Earth turns a new leaf in the brilliant old story,
Which ever is telling, and never is done.

But alway, my heart in the midst of the splendor,
Goes roving afar from the beauty I see,
And thought, with affection ineffably tender,
Flits swifter than pinion of bird or of bee.
To pause in the clefts never trodden by mortal,
To climb to the heights where the morning is born,
To rest, like a pilgrim, at ease in the portal
Ajar for the lark soaring up from the corn.

There, swinging their censers, and lighting the altars,
In gloom or in grandeur, built only for God.
Where winds are the minstrels and mountains the psalters,
Sweet, sweet, are the flowers which sprinkle the sod;
There facing the sky when the tempest is over,
And strong with resistance to whirl and to shock,
The pine to the sun lifts the look of a lover,
With head heaven-tossing, and roots in the rock.

Brave beauty, alone for the Lord and his angels:—
How quiet and soothing the lesson it brings!
A heart-chord struck out from the best of evangels,
A strain for the soul which in solitude sings.
No child of the Father should ever be dreary,
Nor slip from the blessing, the gladness, the light,
For God and the angels will never grow weary
Of guarding and keeping what blooms out of sight.

—Margaret E. Sangster, in S. S. Times.

THE PURE IN HEART.

Some are greatly perplexed to understand how the blood of Christ can cleanse the heart from sin—how we can wash our robes and make them white in the blood of the Lamb. The word blood, in this connection, refers to the atonement that Christ made for sin, and this is the procuring cause of our salvation; and this great price of the blood of the everlasting covenant, secured for us "the gift of the Holy Ghost." So we are made pure by the incoming of the Holy Ghost, through the merits and death of the Lord Jesus Christ. The fullness of the Holy Ghost is entire sanctification.

Let us always remember that when the Holy Ghost comes into the soul, he comes to rule that soul. He will not take full possession until there is an absolute surrender to his sway. Some say, "I submitted when I was converted." Yes, you did; but it was the submission of a rebel laying down his weapons of rebellion. Now you must submit yourself as a loyal man, who is willing to lay down his life for his country. At conversion you gave all your bad things to God: after you are converted you give all your good things. Yea, you give him all—"a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service."

Some years ago a rich man was on his knees at a national camp-meeting seeking for heart-purity, but there was a conflict going on in his mind. In the midst of his praying he took out his pocket-book and pencil, and began to make an estimate of how much he could give to God without embarrassing his business. He concluded that he could give $5,000, and decided to do so and soon the joy of heaven welled up in his heart. That $5,000 started our Mexican Mission! He went home and related his experience to his wife and she was under conviction for holiness, but the blessing lingered and she hardly knew why. At last her husband said: "I have been making a calculation and find that the jewels that you wear, if sold, would sustain a missionary in China for eighteen years, and now will you give them up for Christ's sake?"

When Miss Frances Ridley Havergal was seeking purity of heart she had about fifty jewels that had been given to her. She felt that Jesus must have them, so she sent them—all except a plain pin and watch-chain which she kept for use—to the Missionary Society.

So must we all yield our whole being and substance to God, saying—

"Take my soul and body's powers,
Take my memory, mind, and will,
All my goods and all my hours,
All I know and all I feel,
All I think, or speak, or do,
Take my heart and make it new."

Guide to Holiness.

Meekness.—That eminently holy man and well-known writer (Flavel) did not escape the misfortunes of his times. In the year 1685, his effigy was carried through the streets of Darmouth, accompanied by the magistrates. And yet, so meek was he, that at the moment the effigy was burning, he was praying for the town, and the news reached him at the conclusion of his prayer. He still went on praying, and added, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do." (Luke 23: 34.)

GOING WITHOUT RELIGION.

I fear that when we indulge ourselves in the amusement of going without a religion we are not, perhaps, aware how much we are sustained at present by an enormous mass all about us of religious feeling and religious conviction, so that, whatever it may be safe for us to think, for us who have had great advantages and have been brought up in such a way that a certain moral direction has been given to our characters, I do not know what would become of the less favored classes of mankind if they undertook to play the same game.

Whatever defects and imperfections may attach to a few points of the doctrine of Calvin—the bulk of which was simply what all Christians believe—it will be found that Calvinism, or any other ism which claims an open Bible and proclaims a crucified and risen Christ, is infinitely preferable to any form of polite and polished scepticism which gathers as its votaries the degenerate sons of heroic ancestors, who, having been trained in a society and educated in schools, the foundations of which were laid by men of faith and piety, now turn and kick down the ladder by which they have climbed up, and persuade men to live without God and leave them to die without hope.

The worst kind of religion is no religion at all; and these men, living in ease and luxury, indulging themselves in the "amusement of going without religion," may be thankful that they live in lands where the Gospel they neglect has tamed the beastliness and ferocity of the men who, but for Christianity, might long ago have eaten their carcasses like the South Sea islanders, or cut off their heads and tanned their hides like the monsters of the French Revolution. When the microscopic search of scepticism which has haunted the heavens and sounded the seas to disprove the existence of a Creator, has turned its attention to human society and has found a place on this planet ten miles square where a decent man can live in decency, comfort, and security, supporting and educating his children unspoiled and unpolluted, a place where age is reverenced, infancy respected, manhood respected, womanhood honored and human life held in due regard—when skeptics can find such a place ten miles square on this globe where the Gospel of Christ has not gone and cleared the way and laid the foundation and made decency and security possible, it will then be in order for the skeptical literati to move thither and then ventilate their views. But so long as these very men are dependent upon the religion which they discard for every privilege which they enjoy, they may well hesitate a little before they seek to rob the Christian of his hope and humanity of its faith in that Saviour who alone has given to man that hope of life eternal which makes life tolerable and society possible and robs death of its terrors and the grave of its gloom.

CHRISTIAN HEROES.

That the age of Christian heroism is not past is evident from the following, communicated to the Evangelist by one reporting the International Missionary Confereuce, held six weeks ago at Niagara:

"There were those there, who for Christ's sake and his Gospel's had endured Arctic winters and Tropic heats, who had preached salvation by Christ alone among the bigoted Romanists of Spain and Italy and South America, and the intolerant Mohammedans of Turkey, had ministered to the famine-stricken myriads of North China, and the outcasts and even the lepers of India. One (of the Canada Methodist church), a willing exile with his wife to the Cree Indian country, 700 miles north of Lake Winnipeg, where the cold is 58 degrees below zero, had traveled thousands of miles in sledges drawn by dogs, camping in the snow night after night; another (of the Presbyterian mission to Siam) had been gored by a treacherous elephant in the Laos forests; a veteran missionary of the American Board from Turkey had had three of his colleagues killed at different times by robbers in that land of violence; and yet another, the venerable Dr. Dean, of the Baptist mission to the Chinese, bore in his person the scars of spear thrusts made by Malay pirates near Singapore; while another could tell of his adventures as he had boldly pushed on up the great Yang-tse Kiang river, 1,700 miles from its mouth, to found the Western China mission of the Methodist church, in a city said to number 260,000 families."

WHY DO WE SING IN CHURCH?

If you ask me wherefore song was made a part of the worship, the answer must be because music is the fit language of a service of love. No man sings when he is angry. The notes of accordant voices speak of amity and fellowship. As music is said to consist of the harmony of sweet sounds, and as sounds without harmony become mere noise, so the strains of the psalm or hymn are at once the type and sign of the communion of saints. Where they are heard we know that souls have met who are without varience. They are the signal of the presence of the peace of Christ and of God. And as the cords of human hearts should thrill together in glad unison when they come before God, whenever they find expression in such singing they tend to do so. Music is the tamer of evil passions. We cannot hate each other when we sing together.

Among all the numberless things men can do with their varied faculties, songs are asked of them, to be offered before God, that they may stand before his mercy-seat in unity, and turn from his presence better prepared to live in charity and peace.—New York Evangelist.

SUNDAY WHALING.

I never encountered more than one whaling-captain who scrupled to follow his vocation on the Sabbath. This was a Scotchman, named Graham, master of the ship Leonidas, of Greenock. We met with him in the South Pacific. Although somewhat eccentric, and very decided in the exercises of a strong will, he so commanded the esteem of his crew that, during the entire voyage, not a man deserted from him.

At the time of our first dropping in company with the Leonidas, she wanted sixteen hundred barrels to complete her cargo, while our own ship—the Roger Williams—which had been out half a year longer than the other, required but twelve hundred.

For a month or two previous to the meeting neither vessel had been fortunate; but the next morning, while the Scotchman was barely four miles from us, there appeared, between the ships, a school of whales.

The Roger Williams having been hastily set to, we pushed off in boats, our officers glancing anxiously toward the Leonidas and urging us to pull strongly for the first chance at the game. And, indeed, as the Scotch ship was to the windward, and could, therefore, easily have run down upon the school, the impulse to exertion on our part was very natural.

But the good North Briton sailed leisurely on, starting neither brace nor bowline.

"What's that fellow about?" said his mate. "It can't be that he don't see the whales, yet he hasn't altered his course, nor lowered a boat!"

The fact was surprising to us; we knew not how to account for it. Could his crew have mutinied? or could some other calamity have happened, sufficient to render a whaleman inactive at such a moment?

We had no time, however, to speculate—an exciting chase was before us—and the result of our morning's work was the securing of seven whales, of moderate size, yielding, in the aggregate, one hundred and ninety barrels of oil.

But ere this was accomplished, the truth had dawned upon us with regard to the countryman of excellent old John Knox.

Some of us had heard of a captain—whether Scotch, English, or American—who would not catch whales on Sabbath, yet who always made good voyages; and this quaint old Caledonian must be the man.

It was the Sabbath, surely; the Leonidas was a whaler, wasn't she? yet she lowered no boat, did she? So the force of logic settled the matter.

Several times during the week the Leonidas was only a few miles from us, and more than once her boats and ours were baffled in attempting to approach whales, neither vessel taking any oil in the course of the six days. But when Sabbath again came around the good fortune of our crew returned.

Three miles from the Roger Williams, and almost within hailing distance of the Scot, we captured a huge fellow, yielding one hundred and thirty barrels, while the men of the Greenock looked on, making no demonstration.

"What a fool that old Scotchman is!" said our commander, Captain May. "He might have had that whale in spite of us! No luck all last week, and then to throw away such a chance as this! Who ever heard of such a thing? A man must take whales whenever he gets them!"

So we had secured, in all, three hundred and twenty barrels since first speaking with Captain Graham, while he had taken nothing.

We now wanted less than nine hundred to fill, and wondered when, with his peculiar management, he would complete the sixteen hundred required by his own ship.

"Well, I don't know how he'll come out," remarked a thoughtful old boat-steerer of ours; "but we can't laugh at him much yet. We've been from home twenty-eight months and got twenty-one hundred barrels. He's been from home twenty-two months and got twenty-four hundred barrels. Sixteen hundred more will give him his four thousand, and nine hundred more will give us our three thousand. You'd laugh the other side of your mouths if he should get full first. His ship will stow a thousand more than the Roger Williams, but it would be just like him to fall in with a streak of luck and fill her right up."

Six months passed away, during which time we occasionally fell in with ships of the great fleet of Pacific whalemen, but with the Leonidas oftener than any other; and after all our contemptuous remarks upon her captain, it was with some mortification that, from time to time, we were obliged to admit the general success of the Sabbath-observing Scotchman to be greater than our own.

During all the secular days of some given week, he might cruise in vain, taking not a drop of oil or even seeing a whale, but this would make no difference in his conduct on the succeeding sacred day, when perhaps the monsters would send up in the sunlight their clear spouts all about him, and the boats of other ships would be sweeping down upon the prey.

In the presence of these Sabbath temptations he could bide his time, letting no recurrence of unfruitful weeks or even months shake his devotion to principle. And certain it was, that in spite of occasional disappointments incident to the business, he was, upon the whole, more fortunate than most of his brother-whalers.

He now wanted little more oil than ourselves, and there seemed no longer any joke in the suggestion of his filling up before us. He surely would do so should the same ratio of increase continue with the two ships to the end. But how uncertain the business was! Sometimes a ship in that great fleet of the Paeific would go for a hundred days without taking a whale, then in a week, perhaps secure three or four hundred barrels.

Again we lost sight of the Scotchman, and two months passed away, when early one Sabbath morning our lookouts raised a very large school.

Such incidents with us were more apt to happen as it seemed on the Sabbath than at other time, just as great battles, it is said, occur more frequently then than on week-days.

All was excitement, and away we pulled in the boats; hoping from this school to make a full ship. One works with a strong heart in chase of his last whale.

But the game proved wild, and all day long we followed the shy creatures in vain, until the boats became scattered miles apart.

I was with the captain, and the order which he gave at sunset to pull for the ship was a most welcome one. But he had scarcely spoken when an immense whale, apparently an outsider, not belonging to the school, came up within a furlong of us, sending his spout aloft, and lying temptingly quiet, with his long, dark back above the waves.

So wearied as to be rendered half-indifferent, we exercised less caution than usual, pulling in such a manner that at the moment the harpoon was launched, the bow of the boat went directly upon the whale.

His broad tail was partially under us. He moved it a little aside, then, like lightning, brought it over our heads and struck a downward blow.

Quick as was the stroke, three of us avoided it by plunging overboard; but Captain May and two others were killed upon the spot.

The boat was demolished—beaten flat to the ocean surface—and across the wreck lay the body of the captain; while the two men sank, looking ghastly as they settled slowly beneath us.

All the succeeding night, we three who were left remained clinging to the light cedar boards and timbers, with the corpse of Captain May lying in the midst of us, the ship being twelve miles off, and her crew ignorant of our position.

Floating there with the dead captain, we passed a dreadful trying night, and morning seemed hardly to improve our condition, for it did not reveal the Roger Williams, or any of her boats. She had last been observed to the leeward, and in looking for us would have to beat slowly up against a light wind in a somewhat hazy atmosphere.

A little after sunrise, however, we were gladdened by the sight of a ship to windward coming down in our direction, and presently observed between her and ourselves the spout of a whale.

She hove to and lowered her boats in chase, but the monster turned flukes and went down, leaving his pursuers to pull leisurely along for a few minutes and then lie still, waiting for his reappearnce.

Up he came, breaching high as he shot out of the water so close to us that we could see him distinctly, and once more the four boats of the ship were pulled rapidly toward him, but with such dexterity and silence that we could hear no sound; for now the men had shipped their oars and taken their paddles.

While the pursuers had lain waiting, and keenly looking out for the whale, they had evidently discovered us, for we had seen them wave their little "wafts" to assure us of it; and therefore we could now watch the chase relieved of anxiety for ourselves. The animal slowly moved ahead.

With what energy the paddles were now plied, but how noiselessly! Then a stout, square fellow, at the bow of the leading boat, ceasing his work, braced himself carefully, and we saw the gleam of his harpoon.

In another moment it rushed through the air like an arrow, striking the whale just as he humped his back to go down.

As the monster disappeared, the three other boats were pulled rapidly up to the scene, to be of service should he bid fair, before raising, to take out a greater length of line than the first boat had on board.

He went immensely deep. The second line of the boat which had struck him was added to the first, but this did not make enough, and then the two lines of another were successively bent on. At last he came up, after having exhausted two lines and a half and was killed at the end of a short run.

We were now taken up by one of the boats, and found that our rescuers, who had accomplished so much more on Monday morning than we had on the Sabbath were the good Scotchmen of the Leonidas.

The body of Captain May was reverently taken up, and, as the Roger Williams could now be made out to the leeward, the boat which took us from the forlorn boards was ordered to convey both the corpse and ourselves to our own ship.

Our mate and crew were thrown into consternation at the catastrophe which had happened, and the former insisted upon getting Captain Graham on board to perform the burial service.

The body was accordingly kept until next day, when, the Roger Williams and Leonidas both lying hove to, the Greenock ship-master came on board of us, and, standing upon our quarter-deck, read the impressive words for the occasion, while the British and American flags drooped at half-mast on board the respective ships.

Fast in the back of the captured whale, the Scottish crew found a harpoon, marked "Roger Williams," and hence knew that the leviathan they had taken was the very animal which had given Captain May his death.

As the creature yielded a hundred and fifty barrels, and the Leonidas wanted only one-third of this amount, the remainder was taken by our mate, who had now become captain, and it proved fully sufficient to give us the quantity we required.

A week later, both ships, eompletely full, rode at anchor in the Bay of Islands—the Scotchman stowing a thousand barrels more than ourselves, although his voyage had been six months shorter than ours. and, considering all the circumstances, there could be little doubt that Captain Graham's Sabbath days had been more profitably spent in reading than had been our own in chasing whales.—The Standard Bearer.

"Those strains that once did sweet in Zion glide,"

TEMPERANCE.

The consumption of alcoholic liquors in the United States, according to the government reports for the year ending June 30, 1884, was in round numbers seventy-five million gallons of distilled spirits, five hundred and ninety gallons of malt liquors.

"In taking a conscription in the spring of 1852, for a district of Western Prussia, out of one hundred and seventy-four young men only four were deelared admissable by the reviewing army surgeons, the rest being physically ineapacitated by the use of alcohol."

The brewers and liquor dealers of Zanesville, Ohio, lately petitioned the common council for permission to keep open saloons on Sunday between 12 and 6 P. M. The question was submitted to the people, who promptly vetoed it by a vote of 2,674 to 1,189.

The Catholic World says of the liquor traffic: "It calls for the giant power of the State, and the State s bound to protect us. Weighed side by side with this intolerable evil, the eommercial interest of liquor makers and liquor venders swings like a feather in the scales."

When the Republicans of Cincinnati nominated a candidate for county clerk lately, they set aside two sober citizens and selected the keeper of the most disreputable saloon in the city for the office. The very next night a murder was committed in the candidate's saloon, while he was there drinking with his friends, his own drunkenness being the occasion of the crime.

Phillips Brooks recently, at a Boston meeting said: "No word of mine shall ever be lifted up against fanaticism of any kind in the temperance cause. If there is any cause that justifies what appears to be fanaticism, it is this cause. There is nothing more disgusting and disheartening than to hear ease-loving men, living selfish, luxurious lives, railing against temperance fanaticism."

Recently gathered statistic show that in New York city 93 per cent of the inmates of the House of Industry were sent there for crimes resulting from the use of intoxicatiag liquors, while of the 8,000 liquor sellers of the metropolis 6,438 have been confined in jail or prison. The Examiner pointedly adds: "These jail-birds, before they are granted a license to make other criminals, have to be certified to as "respectable eitizens."

Fred Berkey, Jr., a son of one of the leading citizens of Salem, Ind., while intoxicated appeared on the streets and began an indiscriminate fusillade, He fired nine shots, aiming at whoever happened to be in range. Laura Klerner was shot twice, once in the wrist and once in the shoulder; William McClanahan was shot through the hand; W. S. Percise sustained a flesh wound in the thigh; Jordan Payne received a ball through the body just below the heart and will probably die. Payne, when shot, was in a buggy with a companion. Dragging Payne from the buggy, Berkey compelled the other man to drive on and attempted to escape. Finding this impossible he placed a pistol to his head and fired. The ball took effect and the young man died in fifteen minutes. No eause is known for the bloody work except that Berkey was completely maddened by liquor.

The privilege of selling beer on the grounds of the New York Agricultural Fair has been sold for fourteen hundred and seventy-five dollars. The privilege of keeping the "first dinning hall" brought only $110, and two other dining halls went for $90 and $85. The three eating places are worth $285, and the lager-beer business $1,475. Probably the lager-beer seller has the best bargain of the four, though he pays more than five times as much as the other three together. The fact is full of meaning, and we commend it to the thoughtful. The agriculturists and their friends who attend fairs are probably better than an average of the whole community Does the privilege of selling beer to the American people yield five times as much profit as the privilege of feeding them. The question suggests the vast money power of the "beer interest," aad the facts are most complimentary to us as a people.—N. Y. Christian Advocate.

Wine in the Congo Region.—Mr. H. M. Stanley, in his new work, "The Congo and its Free State," shows how wine is doing much to deteriorate the value of African territory in the eyes of Europeans. Many of the new settlers, he says, are accustomed to take their glass of wine at meal-time. What can the wine matter? the inexperienced ask pleadingly. Stanley answers: "To me, personally, nothing. To you a sudden death, or perhaps a sun stroke. Should you recover you will blame Africa. 'Africa is cruel! Africa is murderous! Africa means death to the European?' And your stupid, unreflecting friend in Europe will echo the cry. Simply because a weakling like you could not resist your little glass at mid day, must all this continent be subjected to the scourge of your fault-finding powers?"

Effect of Alcohol on Arteries.—Dr. Loomis, of New York, on presenting a case of aneurism to his class, made the following pointed statement touching the eausative relation of alcohol in this accident: A man can take two or three glasses of stimulants through the day as he may feel the incliuation, aud he may eontinue this habit for perhaps twenty years without any evident harm accruing from it; but, when this man reaches that period of life when the vital powers are on the deeline, he suddenly feels himself old before his time, for he has all these years been laying the foundation of a chronic endoarteritis. I believe, gentlemen, that fifty per cent of all these diseases arise from the use of alcoholic stimulants. The more I see of disease the more I am convinced that, as a rule, a man is young just in proportion as his arteries are healthy, and old as they are diseased.—Health and Home.

LITERATURE.

Manual of Co-operation, being an epitome of Holyoake's "History of Co-operation." Arranged by the Sociologic Society of America, with an introduction by George Jacob Holyoake. pp. 75. Price, cloth 30 cts., paper 10 cts. John B. Alden, New York.

Combination, competition and co-operation are the steps that mark the social progress of an enlightened people. The evils of the first, whether in the form of monied monopolies or secret conclaves are only too well known, but we have not yet come to the point of suppressing them. The second has been patronized as a remedy for the first, but is proving a failure uniformly. The last we yet look upon as a theory little tried and apt to be mistrusted. England has given the world instances of wonderful success in business co-operation and this little work presents briefly the theory and practice of societies organized and carried on upon this principle. "Co-operation," says Mr. Holyoake, "means concert for the diffusion of wealth. It leaves nobody out who helps to produce it. It touches no man's fortune; it seeks no plunder: it causes no disturbance to society; it gives no trouble to statesmen: it enters into no secret associations; it needs no trades-union to protect its interest: it contemplates no violence; it subverts no order: it loses no dignity; it accepts no gift nor asks any favor: it keeps no terms with the idle and it will break no faith with the industrious." This book should be welcomed as a valuable contribution to the library of every workingman. Upon its principles we might do without hundreds of secret societies with their perpetual bickering and strikes.

The English Illustrated Magazine opens a new volume with the October number. Swinburne contributes an opening poem. The illustrated papers are the first paper on "London Commons," and "Decayed Seaports," which include much of quiet English history. "Adventures on the Equator," is an account, by his father, Joseph Hatton, of Frank Hatton's journeyings and discoveries in Borneo. The initiation of young Mr. Hatton in the Kinarahingan, or leading lodge among the natives of that tropical island, was republished some weeks ago in these columns from the Century.

The Library Magazine occupies a distinctive place in our periodical literature. Its aim is to present in an attractive form, and at a very moderate cost, the most valuable parts of the current foreign periodical writings of the day, with such original American papers as may be required to keep its readers abreast of our home thought. The plan of the magazine excludes fiction, but includes every other form of literature. It is, as its name imports, designed for preservation in libraries, as well as for mere temporary perusal. The October number contains, among others, the following papers: "What can History Teach Us?" by William S. Lilly; "Midsummer in the Soudan," by Gen. Sir Henry Brackenbury: "The Metaphysical Society," by R. H. Hutton; "The Paris Newspaper Press," by Theodore Child: "Death and Afterwards," by Edwin Arnold; "The Poor Collector," by P. G. Hamerton. There is also an exhaustive paper upon "The Greek Anthology," by the editor of Alden's Cyclopedia of Universal Literature. A separate department is entitled "Current Thought," in which the editor presents summaries of various essays of importance in European and American periodicals. John B. Alden, publisher, New York.

Vick's Illustrated Monthly for October, with its handsome flower-piece and useful advice for the month on the vegetable and flower garden, tells us some interesting facts respecting the coca plant of South America, from which the powerful and useful drug, cocaine, is extracted. The leaf when chewed is a strong stimulant, and enable a person to endure long abstinence from food and great fatigue, but is injurious when taken to excess.

THE CHURCHES.

—Drs. W. J. Reid, D. W. Carson, D. R. Kerr, and W. W. Barr, members of the Committee of Conference with the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Synod of the South, appointed at the last meeting of the U. P. General Assembly, attended that meeting at Due West, South Carolina, and were very kindly received. The other member of the committee was Dr. J. T. Cooper of Pittsburgh.

—At this Associate Reformed Synod, a resolution was passed inviting all the Psalm singing churches in the world to meet in a Pan-Psalmody Council, in Kampen, Holland, on the 15th of October, 1886, to unite their testimony to devise means to perpetuate the Psalms and to restore the lost ordinance to the Protestant churches. Revs. R. F. Bradley and E. L. Patton were elected delegates to the Council.

—The Omaha Watchman concedes that the singing in Rev. E. B. Graham's United Presbyterian is the best of all the eleven churches in the city, and it is conducted without organ, fiddle, pipe, sackbut, psaltery or harp, without which some well meaning people almost fear to join their voices in public worship.

—Major D. W. Whittle, of Chicago, has been invited to conduct evangelistic meetings in Kansas during the remainder of the autumn and coming winter. He expects to commence his labors in the city of Lawrence this week. His many friends in this city will bear him on their hearts to the throne of grace, in earnest prayer for the divine blessing to rest on his labors. It is hoped that Christian people, wherever he goes, will give him their hearty and earnest co-operation.

—An invitation has been extended to Messrs. Moody and Sankey to conduct a series of meetings in Bridgeport, Conn., during the last week in October.

—The secular press informs us of the miraculous cure of Miss Ella Betts, of Nevada, O. She had quick consumption, and sank very rapidly, and desired to join the church, but was assured that that would not save her. She was finally admitted to the Presbyterian communion, and the same night lay as if dead three hours. About midnight she told her mother the Lord had saved her, and arose and asked for her clothes, dressed herself, and played on the organ. Ever since she has grown stronger, and appears nearly as well as ever.

—The papers that come from Bolivia show the whole country is ripe for the Gospel, and that notwithstanding all the opposition on the part of the clergy, there are everywhere men ready and willing to accept the Gospel and defend it.

—The mission of the primitive Methodists on the Island Fernando Po, West Africa, has been instrumental in civilizing and Christianizing the people. A new governor, however, through the influence of Jesuit priests, is interrupting the educational work of the Christian missionaries.

—Mr. Kirias, the Albanian colporteur, in Bulgaria, who had been captured by the brigands and a heavy price set for his ransom, has at last been released. It is said that a ransom was paid for him by friends, aided by the British and Foreign Bible Society amounting to about 700 liras, or $3,000. The peril from the brigands in some parts of European Turkey is very great, and the work of our missionaries is hindered on that account.

—In the Transvaal, Africa, the Wesleyans have been favored during the year with gracious spiritual seasons. On New Year's they beheld a scene never witnessed before in any English church in the Transvaal—eleven young people kneeling round the communion rails earnestly seeking the Saviour. The native service was rather polyglot. One missionary preached in English; another translated it into Dutch, and a native evangelist told it again in Sira-long, making the service a trilingual one.

—The church missionary society is able to report a large increase in the number of men offering themselves for service in the missionary field. Eighteen have been accepted for immediate service, including among the number eight University graduates. This society also receives men for training for missionary service, and twenty-six persons have been accepted for this purpose. May missionary revivals like this, which has brought forward so many candidates for service in foreign lands, be experienced in this country as well as in England!—Northern Christian Advocate.

—Camp meetings are being held at several points in Florida, and are attended by unusual numbers. Many conversions are reported, and much interest is manifested by all classes.

—St. Clement's Protestant church, Philadelphia, has a guild of the Iron Cross for workingmen, the members pledging themselves against blasphemy, intemperance, and unchastity.

—The Rev. John F. Goucher, of Baltimore, is supporting many schools in Japan, China and India, for the benefit of which he will place in the treasury of the Methodist Missionary Society this year $13,000.

—Of the 43,402,970 whites in the United States, 21,602,687, or about one-half, are either foreign born or children of parents of foreign birth. The Lutheran Observer says that about one-half of them come from lands holding the Lutheran faith.

—The services conducted by E. W. Bliss, evangelist, at the tent on Union Park street, Boston, for the last two months, have attracted large numbers, especially of those usually called non-church-goers, with whom they seem to have been very popular. At the close of the services a large number remained to give in their names as having received especial benefit from these meetings.

—The Baptists have already become quite numerous and influential in some parts of Australia. Quite recently the Home Mission Society of the denomination held its annual meeting in the town hall, Melbourne, when 1,200 sat down to tea. The public meeting held afterward was attended by 2,500 persons.

—The Hemlandet says: "The first 'Christian sermon' in America, in the tongue of our forefathers, was held by Bishop Jon, who arrived in America (Vineland) from Iceland in 1059 and suffered a martyr's death. Greenland's first bishop, Erik, arrived here in 1121. He also found his death in this country. After Erik's leave Bishop Œzur of Lund, Skane, Sweden, ordained a learned priest, Arnold, as Bishop of Greenland. He was succeeded in 1150 by Bishop Jonas Knut (Canute). We know at present the names of 17 bishops who have been in Greenland previous to 1410, and of those several visited the colonies of the Northmen (Nordmænnen) in America.

—The seventy-fifth annual meeting of the American Board will be held in Boston on Oct. 13–16. The sermon will be preached by Rev. Dr. Walker, of Hartford, and an address will be delivered by Rev. Dr. Storrs, of Brooklyn. Short addresses are expected from representatives of the churches connected in past years with the American Board.

—The first regularly appointed missionary among the Jews of Chicago, the Rev. S. D. Berger, will be ordained as a Gospel minister at Grace English Lutheran church to-morrow at 7:30 o'clock P. M. This gentleman is a native of Austria, and speaks the Hebrew tongue as a mother tongue, but has had the best opportunities in Europe and some in America to fit himself to preach Christ among his people.

—The Moravian missionaries among the aborigines of Australia say the "eventide" of their work is approaching. The blacks will soon be extinct. But in view of this fact, they increase their efforts, that the departing race may know and trust in Christ.

—When the American Board commenced its mission work among the Dakota Indians they only numbered 25,000; now they are over 40,000. Then they were degraded heathen, without a written language, which the missionaries gave them. Last year 117 new members were received into their churches.

—The greatest single power in London yet is Charles H. Spurgeon. He is an omnibus in himself and full as ever. His pulpit rings with the same old fearless, faithful Gospel; his fertile brain is organizing new orphanages, and city missions and other effective agencies for bodies and souls. It is not too much to say that Mr. Spurgeon has accomplished as much for the moral welfare of London as the whole Salvation Army combined; and the good he has done requires no subtraction for indiscretions or infelicities of doctrine or methods. He went into Scotland last week for a short vacation; and for old friendship's sake I agreed to preach for his people. The Sabbath was very hot for this northern latitude, and the sight of that vast multitude from the very lofty pulpit (or balcony rather,) was enough to make a man's head swim. The three hymns were sung with a volume of voice that came surging up around the pulpit like a miniature Niagara.—T. L. Cuyler in the Independent.

LODGE NOTES.

—At the late Grand Lodge of Illinois Good Templars one-half of the delegates had to take the Grand Lodge degree, in order to participate in the business. Thirty lodges have gone down the past year.

—The Texas Freemason, speaking of New York, says, "The male population of the State was 2,505,322 when the last census was taken, about one in every thirty-five of the male inhabitants of all ages is a Mason, or not far from one in every ten of adult males."

—The Detroit Freemason being asked if Governor Alger, of Michigan is a Mason replies: "He is an Entered Apprentice Mason. He had taken the first degree when the war broke out and he went to do battle for his country. He has not taken any other degree since, owing to business and other causes." This is a good answer, the words "other causes" covering up any amount of disgust no doubt at the deception practiced on him.

—The Knights of Labor, which is a powerful organization in the suburbs of So. Chicago, is pushing John Fitzgerald, of the car shops, for the position of school trustee. This is an open attempt to accomplish what Masons are all the while doing in secret.

—Frank M, Bristol, a Methodist preacher of this city, was lately reported as a Mason of high degree in the Inter Oceun, the same paper says he was made a Knight Templar in Apollo Commandery last week.

—The Home Circle is a new beneficiary organization, having in Chicago 225 members in four lodges, viz.: the Union, Chicago, Calumet, and Crescent. The Chicago lodges of the order wish the recognition of the supreme body, though not regularly entitled to representation in that body until they themselves are 1,000 strong, large enough to form a grand lodge. The Supreme Lodge meets in Boston, Oct 13th.

—The annual meeting of the Royal Order of Scotland was held in Boston last week. Says the Detroit Freemason, "In the absence of Ill. Bro. Albert Pike, Provincial Grand Master, the Deputy Ill. Bro. Josiah H. Drummond presided. The usual business was transacted, four deaths reported, and a number of new members received. The business concluded with the annual banquet, at which the wives and daughters of the members were present. The next meeting will be held in the city of Washington, D. C."

To any of our readers, the editor of Buds and Blossoms and Friendly Greetings, I. F. Avery, Halifax, Nova Scotia, offers during the next month to send a free sample copy, in hope that its worth will invite continuance.

The object of the National Letter Return Association of Chicago is, to afford everybody the same facility for the prompt return of non delivered letters, that business men enjoy who have "return request" printed on their envelopes.

It is not convenient for commercial, and other travelers to carry a supply of printed envelopes; nor for persons sending but few letters to have their name and address printed on their envelopes. They do not purchase envelopes in quantities to justify the expense of printing—yet the return of their letters when non-delivered is as desirable to them as it is to those sending a number of letters.

Persons sending few letters are more liable to error in mis-directing than business men who send many letters.

To these and all others the Association secures the safe return of letters by a plain and simple method. For $1 there will be sent 1,000 gummed stamps to be put on each envelope, which will secure the return of the letter.

The will of Robert R. McIlvain, a rich New Yorker who died in 1881, bequeathed his books and pamphlets and $10,000 to found a public library from which all trashy books and papers were to be excluded.

The health department of Chicago has begun prosecutions against twenty-eight milkmen whose merchandise was recently rated by Professor Long as "skimmed," "bad skimmed," or watered."

The law department of Yale College opened Oct. 1st. One of the new students is Miss Alice B. Jordan, of Michigan, a graduate of Michigan University, and already an attorney at law. She has the honor of being the first female who ever attended the law or any other department of the college.

In 1881 Paul Broder, a wealthy college professor of Beloit, Wis., died from what was supposed to be the effects of falling down stairs. Recently relatives took the matter up, and a coroner's inquest was held at Janesville, the jury returning a verdict that Prof. Broder had been murdered.

HOME AND HEALTH.

SALT AS A DESTROYER OF THE TEETH.

At a recent meeting of the New York Odontological Society, Dr. E. Parmly Brown said:

I will venture the assertion that the excessive use of common salt is one of the main factors in the destruction of human teeth to day. I am now engaged in collecting some statistics on this point, from which I hope in time to demonstrate, what seems to me to be the fact, that common salt excessively used is a great solvent of the human teeth. If it will injure the teeth through the chemistry of our systems in some way or other that I will not attempt to explain to night, why might it not also have the effect of preventing a good development of the teeth when taken into the system in excess? I have lately procured some statistics from the Sandwich Islands, from a gentleman who has been there covering a period of over forty years, that are very suggestive and interesting. Within that period the teeth of the Sandwich Islanders have decayed rapidly, and since they have begun to decay it has been noticed that the natives are in the habit of biting off great chunks of salt and eating it with their food. According to all accounts, the teeth of the Sandwich Islanders were formerly the most free from decay of any people on the face of the earth, if I remember rightly. You will find that people who eat a great deal of salt and a great deal of sugar are often entirely toothless. I know several instances of candy storekeepers where three generations are entirely toothless. People who eat an excessive amount of salt are tempted to eat large quantities of candy, pickles and vinegar. There seems to be a craving for those substances after the excessive use of salt.

WHOOPING COUGH.

Dr. C. R. Illingworth writes in the Lancet: "I have found a popular remedy very efficacious in the treatment of whooping cough. I refer to picked oakum, worn by the patient either round the neck in muslin or on the chest as a pad stitched to the underclothing. Locally I apply the glycerine of tannic acid with a laryngeal brush two or three times a day, and internally I prescribe one, two, or three-grain doses of chloral, one, two or three minims of belladonna, one grain of allum, and one minim of carbolic acid, in sirup, every two or three hours. A liniment of turpentine, acetic acid and yolk of egg is an excellent application for the chest, neck and back, night and morning with the liniment of belladonna added in the proportion of one to seven. In children of two years or more, I have applied carbolic acid and glycerine, in the proportion of 1 to 15, to the larynx with success, each application checking a paroxysm at once. With the above mentioned treatment I cure the worst cases in from seven to ten days."

AN IDEA IN FRUIT DRYING.

The use of oil stoves is becoming very common. They may be made to do good service in drying fruit, of which, in some sections, there is a large excess this year. Whoever burns hard coal (anthracite) knows what a coal-sifter is. The simplest form is a square box of half-inch stuff, with a coarse wire-cloth bottom, and no top. The wire-cloth should be of galvanized iron, and have about four squares to the inch. The sides of the box are about three inches high, and it is about fourteen inches square. These boxes are easily made, the wire being attached by strips, nailed to the edges of the frame. Fruit laid upon the wire in the boxes, and several boxes piled evenly one upon the other, may be quickly dried by placing the stack thus made upon an oil-stove. The heat must be equalized by an iron plate laid above the flame, which must be kept low. The lowermost box needs to be removed and placed on top every now and then, special care being taken not to cook the fruit. The drying will thus go on entirely under control, and almost as rapidly as in the patent dryers. For large quantities a patent dryer may be used.—American Agriculturist.

INSOLUBLE CEMENT GLUE.

In order to render glue insoluble in water, even hot water, it is only necessary when dissolving for use, to add a little potassium bichromate to the water and expose the glued part to the light. The proportion of bichromate will vary with circumstances, but for most purposes about one-fiftieth of the amount of glue will suffice.—Scientific American.

MOSQUITO OIL.

The Angler vouches for the effectiveness of the following mixture for keeping off mosquitoes:

R—Olive oil	3 parts.
Oil of pennaroyal	2 "
Glycerine	1 "

To be well shaken before applying to the face and hands. Avoid getting the mixture into the eyes.

Mrs. Anne Burgess, wife of James Burgess, of Forestville, Md., a suburb of Washington, to facilitate the kindling of a fire poured coal oil in it from a can. It immediately exploded, throwing the burning fluid all over her. She ran out of the house crying for help, and when found was entirely naked and prostrate upon the ground, literally roasted alive and writhing in the greatest agony. Dr. Torrey was promptly called but could afford no relief whatever. She died after twelve hours of the most terrible suffering. In a few days she would have become a mother.

FARM NOTES.

HINTS ON DESTROYING WEEDS.

Much of the effort in weed destruction is so widely misdirected that it is not nearly so effective as it should be. We often see advice to cut out plantain or wild carrot by hand, in meadows or pastures. This is well enough where the plants are scattering, and should always be done if it is not possible or convenient to plow the weeds under. But cutting by hand does very little to clean the land of such foul pests. For every plant that appears in meadow or pasture there are, probably a thousand seeds lying dormant in the ground ready to grow as soon as the soil is stirred. With a hoed crop on weed-seed land, millions of weeds may be destroyed by frequent cultivation, in a single season.

There are other classes of weeds which appear in winter grain which can also be best fought by well-directed use of the plow. Red-root, where the land is thoroughly seeded with it, will appear in such quantities that hand pulling is impossible. We probably cannot destroy much of this weed by hoed crops in summer. We have seen it appear by the thousands on land that had been well cultivated in corn and potatoes during the summer, and sown to winter wheat in the fall. It is probably the nature of red root seed not to grow until the cool, moist weather which usually comes just at wheat-seeding time. Hence the seeds brought to the surface during the heat of summer do not germinate and are not destroyed. But fall plow this land at the proper time for winter wheat sowing, and the red-root will all grow where it is near enough to the surface to germinate. Then plow in spring for oats or barley, and a large share of the red-root will be destroyed.

So far as possible horse labor should be utilized in the destruction of weeds. If much is done by hand labor or hoe it is evidence of mismanagement. It makes farming more expensive than it need be and in doing this makes good farming more difficult. In the parable about the husbandman's field, in which the enemy sowed tares, it was possibly the best that could then be done "to let both grow together until the harvest." But he would scarcely now be considered a good farmer who would knowingly put a crop on land where it was sure to be crowded by weeds that could not be removed except by its own destruction.—American Cultivator.

The American Dairyman says: Let a drop of fresh milk fall into a drop of pure water. If the milk promptly disseminates itself through the water, the cow that yielded that milk is not with calf, but if it sinks to the bottom of the glass as it falls upon the water, and does not produce but little of a milky cloud, the cow is pregnant. The specific gravity and viscidity of the albuminous milk being heavier than water, thus retains the drop of milk and causes it to sink. We advise dairymen to make a note of this and give it a test. If reliable, the information may be of great value to them.

C. M. Weed says in the Philadelphia Press that to keep flies out of the stable nothing is better than soft soap and carbolic acid thrown on the floor once or twice a day. The mixture may be made of crude carbolic acid, which can be obtained very cheap, and ordinary soft soap. The amount of the acid depends upon the strength of the soap. This can be easily told by pouring the two together and letting them stand, after thoroughly mixing, for an hour or two. Then mix a little with soft water. If too much acid is present, it will be shown by particles of oil floating on the surface. Two or three tablespoonfuls of acid to a quart of soap will usually suffice.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

COUNTRY.

The Illinois State House Commissioners having expressed a determination to fill the niches in the rotunda of the Capitol with bronze statues of Gov. Ninian Edwards, Gov. Shadrach Bond, Supreme Judge Sydney Breese, Gen. Grant, Lyman Trumbull, John A. Logan, Gov. R. J. Oglesby and Wm. R. Morrison, a feeling of indignation pervades the popuiation of Springfield that the commissioners should plan to thus illegally expend the appropriation, and to take upon themselves the work of honoring the Illinoisans mentioned. Injunction proceedings are probable.

At least thirteen inches of rain fell at Jacksonville, Fla., in four days, and the railroad people think it unsafe to send out any but work trains.

One of the buildings of the insane asylum at Warm Springs, M. T., was burned Tuesday, four of the inmates perishing in the flames.

At midnight Sept. 27, a camp of Chinamen at Newcastle coal mines, near Seattle, Wash. T., was visited by a masked mob. A white man who was doing guard duty was compelled to surrender his arms, and after some parley the visitors agreed to give the Chinamen twenty-four hours to leave the camp, threatening to riddle with bullets all who remained at the end of that time.

A peculiar kind of oar, seemingly part silver, but hard as steel, was struck in Richview, Ill., Monday by a miner who was sinking a well. People in the district are greatly interested in the find.

A falling meteor at Pittsburg, Saturday night caused a half dozen rumbling explosions, alarming many, who thought they were earthquake shocks. The aerolite was found Monday night buried deep in the soil on a farm near Cannonsburg, south of Pittsburg.

An omnibus containing school children was struck by a train at a crossing in New Britain, Conn. Minnie and Lottie Dyson died of their injuries and their brother Charles cannot recover. Two sons of David Appenzellar were killed at a crossing near Chambersburg, Pa., their father narrowly escaping.

A decree ordering the sale of the West Shore road for not less than $22,000,000 was entered at Newburgh Thursday by Judge Brown. Abram S. Cassidy was appointed referee for the sale of the property.

The loss sustained by reason of the collapse of the building in the rear of the Dake bakery on Clark street, Chicago, at an early hour Thursday morning, will be about $72,000. A number of men engaged in the building escaped after they found the floors settling.

The mud-drum connecting a battery of boilers in Clarke & Co.'s solar iron works at Pittsburg, exploded Friday morning, blowing machines, hoop-iron and tools in all directions, a flying missile bursting the cylinder head of a large engine, the escaping steam doing deadly work among the employes. Seventeen men and boys were burned or maimed, two of the victims dying after removal to the hospital. Four others are thought to be mortally injured. This is the third explosion in the same mill within five years.

A terrible accident happened on the Fergus Falls branch of the Northern Pacific railroad, seven miles west of St. Paul Sunday morning, by which five men lost their lives, and thirty or forty more were more or less injured. John Robinson's show left Wahpeton, D. T., in two sections. When within seven miles of Fergus Falls, the head or baggage section broke in two while going up a heavy grade, and ten or twelve cars went flying back for a mile at a terrific rate. On the rear of the train were three sleeping cars, occupied by workmen, over two hundred in number, all of whom were sound asleep, and not aware of impending danger. The engineer of the rear section saw the cars approaching, but only had time to stop his train before it struck his engine with tremendous force, throwing the three sleepers from the track and smashing them beyond recognition. More than a hundred men were buried in the debris.

The village of Westwood, N. J., was struck by a regular Western cyclone about 1 o'clock Sunday afternoon, causing much damage, but no loss of life. A dark funnel-shaped cloud, which seemed to rise from behind the hills west of the village, approached at a terrific rate of speed. The path of the cyclone was about 200 feet wide, almost directly to the center of the village. The hotel, a new, but unfinished school-house, and the village church were completely wrecked, and many dwellings, barns, and outbuildings were scattered about the fields. C. S. Debaun's distillery, which contained 13,000 gallons of cider and a large quantity of apple whisky, is almost a complete loss.

FOREIGN.

The Sultan has issued a decree ordering the Turkish troops to mass at Adrianople. Servia has 80,000 men under arms. Russian journals express the opinion that the Constantinople conference will be without result.

The Earl of Shaftesbury, the English philanthropist, died Thursday, aged 84 years.

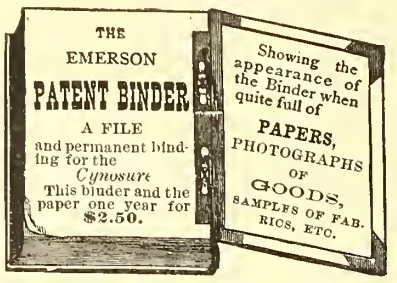
A dispatch to the London daily Telegraph states that 6,000 Russians have crossed the Danube in Bulgaria and arrived in Roumania by special trains during the night.

Mr. Gladstone, replying to telegrams from Bucharest and Philippopolis, has written as follows to the metropolitan of Bulgaria: "I understand that the powers are disposed to treat the recent events with caution and moderation. I sincerely trust that the attitude of the population will encourage the powers in such a course. My position now is that of a simple member of Parliament, but I shall continue to hold the same views in regard to the Balkans as I have held for the last three years."

Disastrous floods covering an area of 3,500 square miles, have occurred in the Presidency of Bengal, the largest and most populous of the twelve main divisions of British India. A great amount of property has been destroyed and numbers of lives lost. Many families have been made destitute. Houses, crops, cattle, and portable goods of every description have been carried away by the floods. The government authoritiss are distributing provisions and clothing, and doing all they can to relieve the sufferers.

In consequence of the inauguration of compulsory vaccination a howling mob surrounded the East End branch of the health office in Montreal last week Monday, and completely wrecked the building. The police on duty were powerless, and the mob, gathering strength from this, marched upon the central office in the City Hall. After the mob smashed the central office, they turned their attention to the central police station, and soon had all the windows in that building broken. Revolver shots were freely fired at the police. To scare them the police fired over their heads, only to be received with jeers and laughter. The constables now charged the mob, clubbing them right and left and succeeded in dispersing them, but not before they had wrecked the greater portion of the Court House windows, which are opposite the City Hall. The mob broke up into different bodies, and proceeded to wreck the windows of the Herald office and the windows of the office of the Medical Health officer, chairman of the Finance Committee and Public Vacinators. A number of arrests were made.

A dispatch to the London News from Sofia says: "Bulgaria is one military camp. All the male population between the ages of 15 and 45 are under arms, and thousands of volunteers are being enrolled daily. They appear to be earnest and determined."



In summing up the situation in regard to the revolution in Roumelia Smalley's special cablegram says that it develops no decided phases, and that war still hangs in the balance. The danger of the situation is increased by the delays of the powers, owing to difficulty at arriving at combined action. Other cablegrams say that the President of the Hungarian Council in addressing its members made the authoritative statement that at the recent meetings of the Austrian and Russian Emperors no matters were discussed that in any way related to Roumelia. A deputation of Bulgarians waited on the Czar at Elsinore, Denmark, and solicited his approval of the annexation of Roumelia to Bulgaria. The Czar in replying to the deputation, said he would endeavor to secure accord among the powers to effect a pacific solution of the Roumelian difficulty.

This Washboard is made of one solid sheet of heavy corrugated zinc, which produces a double-faced board of the best quality and durability. The fluting is very deep, holding more water, and consequently doing better washing than any washboard in the market. The frame is made of hard wood and held together with an iron bolt running through a tube formed on the lower edge of the zinc, thus binding the whole together in the most substantial manner, and producing a wash board which for economy, excellence and durability, is unquestionably the best in the world. We find so many dealers that object to our board on account of its DURABILITY, saying, "It will last too long. We can never sell a customer but one." We take this means to advise customers to INSIST upon having the NORTH STAR WASHBOARD.
And take no other. If he does not keep it, it is because of its durability.
The best is the cheapest.

The Hamilton county Ohio Prohibition convention held at No. 200 Vine street, Cincinnati, August 21st, broke the ice on the lodge question and set the example for all the Prohibition friends by resolving, "THAT WE ARE IN FAVOR OF OPEN METHODS OF WORK, and we therefore bid God speed to the W. C. T. U. in its methods and labors, and will supplement their endeavors by our vote." Let this action be echoed all along the line, and Americans and Prohibitionists can easily be one.

The Mormon General Conference last Wednesday received a long general epistle from the two presidents of the church, Taylor and Cannon, in which the Edmunds law and the authorities engaged in enforcing it are denounced with the strongest language, and the Mormons are urged to stand by the faith. The letter expresses a slight hope in the clemency of President Cleveland. Meantime the work of prosecution drives on relentlessly. Five Mormons were convicted last Monday, and on refusing to agree to obey the law, were all given the full sentence of $300 fine and six months' imprisonment. The letter of the presidents further advises the Mormons to avoid secret societies of all kinds!! Truly the poor Saints of the Latter Day are now in an evil case. Beset on all sides by the law that jails them because they will adhere to the oaths they have taken in their Endowment House lodge, now their very leaders and oracles demand that they shall avoid that to which they have sworn. If Taylor and Cannon can find a society more secret than their own we should be thakful for the information.

"Woe be to the Judge that sits on the bench of the Third District Court. We will not stand his abuse much longer," was the solemn sentence pronounced on Judge Zane by Apostle Heber J. Grant, in the Mormon Tabernacle on a late Sunday. Nevertheless Judge Zane lives, and we hope will live to see the last of the Mormon abomination. To him Anti-masonry is indebted for a precedent which may in time be useful. Finding that the secret oaths of the Endowment House lay right across the path of justice in the Territory; that witnesses either would not testify or would swear to falsehoods; and that Mormon jurymen had no regard for the oath of God if it conflicted with their Mormon oath, he boldly drew a line before the jury-box on every forsworn Mormon in every case where the tenets of the church were involved. His decision and practice has been sustained by the United States Supreme Court and he has thus been enabled to convict scores of polygamists. The case with Masonry is almost exactly the same. We must remember this.

Infidel and Masonic France holds its elections on the Sabbath. A nation that thus scouts the law of God might be expected to use its power in injustice and cruelty in the greedy endeavor to seize upon Madagascar and Tonquin. But the leaders have been rebuked by a "Conservative" victory in the election of October 4th. There is a universal explanation that the large gains of the monarchist factions are due to the extravagance of the government in foreign wars. The people embraced the opportunity to protest against the disastrous colonial policy pursued during recent years. The policy of conquest in Tonquin and Madagascar, M. de Molineari, chief of the French delegates in Canada, says was never popular with the French people. France lost 15,000 men in the Tonquin campaign, and her losses in money, including the cost of building forts, hospitals, and frontier defenses, were $215,000,000. As a result of the elections the Tonquin operations are much restricted and a large portion of the troops have been ordered home, and a portion of the Cabinet have resigned. It is believed this defeat will not endanger the republic but will put a stop to foreign aggression.

A remarkable Morgan case has transpired among the Chinese of Oregon and has reached the courts, as the dispatch quoted in our "Lodge Notes" shows. The best comment we can make is to reprint the following from the Chicago Daily Herald, entitled "A Chinese Morgan:" "The Chinese of Portland, Ore., have a Morgan named See Choy. Mr. Choy was a member of a Mongolian secret society; which suspected him of divulging its secrets. He was enticed to the lodge-room one evening and murdered, but by whom is yet something of a mystery. The Chinese have themselves put forward a fellow named Wah Tim as the guilty man and are making an effort in their own peculiar way to have him convicted, but the authorities believe that he is being made the seapegoat for the sins of many others. This inference is well warranted by the known customs of the race. Many of the most mysterious crimes against Chinamen are perpetrated by Chinamen themselves, who have their own professional assassins, and who frequently use them to carry out sentences imposed by their own secret tribunals. The Portland tragedy looks like the work of one of these hired murderers to protect whom when in trouble it becomes the duty of the entire colony. If such is the case the law may hang somebody for the crime committed, but the chances are that the victim will not be the guilty party."

THE KINGDOM OF GOD ON EARTH.

BY REV. DAVID MCFALL.

We say "Thy kingdom come" every day. We believe in the reality and desirableness of the kingdom and in the supremacy of his will, and hence the prayer. If it is uttered under any other impression it is insincere and parrot-like. There are some who affect to believe that the establishment of this kingdom on earth as it is in heaven would be a world-wide calamity, and that the doing of his will here as it is done there would deluge the nations with blood. In support of this they appeal to history. They have read of fires being kindled, and gibbets erected, and inquisitions held, where wheel, and boot and thumbscrew, and such instruments of torture were employed: and as this was done by men professing to be doing God's service, they predict a return of the same methods, if Christianity should ever become a controlling power in the laws of any land.

We think these gentlemen should quiet their apprehensions. They are in no danger. If they would take a second look at history's page they would see that when blood flowed freest there was not an infidel drop in it. That fact should be reassuring. It is hardly within the range of possibility that a preacher of blasphemy should suffer for righteousness' sake; or a believer in nothing be persecuted for his creed. That would be a new thing under the sun. The simple truth is, those who suffered were believers in the Lord Jesus Christ; and they suffered because they persisted in doing what they could to establish his kingdom on earth as it is in heaven. They suffered indeed at the hands of men who claimed to believe in the same name, and to be acting for the good of the same cause, and by a very large exercise of charity—that charity that "believeth all things"—we may suppose them to have been sincere. But that they were wholly mistaken we confidently appeal to the enlightened judgment of the 19th century. Our terrified friends, therefore, are simply putting the shoe on the wrong foot, and it is all we can do to give them credit for sincerity in doing it. The facts are so plain that even fools should not err therein.

One circumstance, however, seems to lend color to the genuineness of their alarm. They affiliate with the ancient oppressor. In case a difficulty should arise they want to be on the safe side. This looks a little cowardly, but we are not responsible for it. The fact is as we have stated it. On all test questions as to to the actual supremacy of a pure Christianity, the infidel and the Catholic stand shoulder to shoulder, and always in the opposition. Witness the hostility to the Bible in the public schools, opposition to Sabbath laws, chaplains in the army and navy, and the general onslaught on every vestige of Christianity found in the institutions of our country. In all this the infidel is hand in glove with the Catholic. The closest observer can hardly tell which is animated by the deeper hatred of Protestant Christianity.

It is curious to notice this alliance. The infidel does not love the Catholic nor the Catholic the infidel. Oh, no. It is not on that principle that they have joined hands in this crusade. But the infidel, with as little discrimination as a goat at a mirror, attacks whatever religion is uppermost; and so, under pretence of averting persecution he seeks to overthrow that very form of religion, which, like its Master, has ordered the sword into its scabbard; and lends whatever aid he can to the Catholic, who, in his admiration for the methods of St. Peter would soon leave the most of us without our ears. And it is just in order to reach this very desirable end that the Catholic accepts of infidel assistance. He seeks to overthrow Protestant Christianity in order to establish the good old regime when blood flowed like water in the interests of the Romish corporation. You will perceive, therefore, the different intention which each has in view. The infidel wishes to avert all persecution for conscience' sake, but foolishly goes to work to saw off the very limb on which liberty of conscience depends. The Catholic encourages him in his work, in the meantime keeping his weather eye on the inquisition, and making no rash promises as to what he will do when the limb is down.

We think it is just as well, however, that these two should be united. Protestant Christianity has to deal with both of them, and the sooner they get squarely in front so much the better. We may be permitted to hope the contest will not be bloody, although the readiness with which 19th century civilization appeals to the sword is not very encouraging. Of this only we are assured that Christ's kingdom will come, and his will shall be done on earth as it is in heaven. The prayers of the church for these many years will not always remain unanswered. The enemy will not always prevail. The Lord will one day take to him his great power and reign. The kingdoms of this world will yet become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ.

But what are we to understand by God's kingdom on earth? Those who oppose its establishment are constantly reminding us that Christ said "My kingdom is not of this world." Very true. Still he did not say "My kingdom is not in this world." If he had that would have settled the question. On the contrary numerous passages of Scripture speak of his kingdom as here. Would he have taught us to pray daily "Thy kingdom come," if there were no kingdom to come? Or is he to "take to him his power and reign" over nothing? Surely not. He has a kingdom then in this world, which is to grow, like the stone cut out of the mountain without hands, until it fills the whole earth.

This kingdom is spoken of both as to its character and its effects. In its character it consists in "righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost." Hence it presents a strong contrast to the character hitherto borne by the kingdoms of this world, which has been very largely that of iniquity, spoilation and war.

The effect of its establishment on earth is described in the loftiest language. The mountains and the hills shall bring forth peace to the people. The nations shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks, and learn war no more. All bitterness and animosity shall depart. The wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard lie down with the kid, the calf and the young lion and the fatling together, and a little child shall lead them. The cow and the bear shall feed and their young ones lie down together, and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. The young child shall play at the hole of the asp, and the weaned child put his hand on the adder's den, and they shall not hurt or destroy in all my holy mountain. The effect of it on the lives and enjoyments of men is also spoken of. There is to be a new state of society, and a very much improved condition of human life. There is to be a new heaven and a new earth, and so superlative will these be that the former will not be remembered nor come into mind. The voice of weeping shall be no more heard, but the voice of joy and rejoicing instead. The ravages of disease will be stayed, and the grave will be reached through maturity, "As a shock of corn cometh in in his season." There shall be no more an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days. The earth herself shall renew her youth and bring forth by handfuls. There shall be abundance of corn in the earth upon the top of the mountains. The earth shall keep jubilee, and God even our God shall bless us.

This is the effect, pictorially described, of the establishment of Christ's kingdom on earth. It represents a time when the song of the angels shall be realized, "Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace and good will to men." And when this comes to pass we may be sure that most of the evils that now curse the earth will be abolished. Such crying evils as intemperance and the use of tobacco by which the resources of the family are criminally squandered, its peace destroyed, and the moral and spiritual welfare of it seriously imperiled, will be discontinued.

But this idea of the kingdom of Christ does not complete the picture. It is worth while to labor and pray and wait for this, but it is not all. Indeed we could hardly have this much without having more. Such peace, happiness, and prosperity could hardly be the world's portion unless the governments of the earth were different from what they are to-day. Wendell Phillips used to say that governments were like crutches, or go-carts, to help the people along: and he hoped for the time when the people would be so good, and enlightened, and loyal to the right that they would get along without them. We do not look for that, but we do look for the time when the governments of this world will be born again; when they will be loyal in their allegiance to King Jesus, when they will make his will their supreme law, and thus recognize him Lord of all. When this point has been reached the governments of this world, instead of being crutches and go-carts, to be laid aside as useless by a people who have learned to do without them, will be found to be earth's greatest blessing—the crowning ornament of a blessed and happy people. Order is heaven's first law. There is government there. The Lord Jesus Christ rules there at the right hand of God; and if he were obeyed on earth as he is in heaven, earth would be, according to its measure, as happy as heaven. The more extensively his kingdom is established here, the more fully his will is done, and the nearer it reaches all the springs of human action, the brighter and better the day will be for our world.

This kingdom is established first of all in the heart of the individual. Men are not born Christians. New blood must be infused in all our veins. Some are early admitted as Jeremiah was, others, like Paul, are born out of due time. But no matter how or when the change is wrought, the kingdom of God is then set up in the heart. Then the peace of God fills the soul and the joy of the Holy Ghost makes it vocal with song.

But such a heart is not content to be alone in this respect. It ardently wishes all hearts to be brought into the same relations to God, and to enjoy the same blessings. The very spirit of the kingdom of God is like leaven which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal till the whole was leavened. Put one such heart in a million, and if true to itself, it will not rest until all are brought into obedience to Jesus Christ. The living waters always overflow. As these hearts multiply in any particular place, or nation, they must, if true to themselves, exert a healthful influence on public affairs. It is not possible for instance, that a dozen true Christians should conduct a business on anti-Christian principles. Would twelve men, separately or individually, abhoring dishonesty, conduct a joint business on dishonest principles? Would they, reverencing the name of God themselves, make blasphemy a prominent feature of their firm? Or each of them being a firm believer in the sancity of the Sabbath would they unitedly profane it? No, certainly not, unless drugged and cozzened by fallacious reasoning, until they had come to imagine that social relations destroyed individual responsibility. Hence, whenever Christians are responsible for the management of public affairs, if true to themselves, these affairs must be conducted on Christian principles. Whenever truly Christian people become sufficiently numerous in any locality to exercise a controlling influence over its affairs, the kingdom of God might be established there: and as soon as they rise to a just sense of their responsibility and make their influence felt, the kingdom of God will be established there. In this way the kingdom of God, which is first established in the heart, comes abroad, and is finally openly and publicly established in the world. And when this comes to pass will not that kingdom be a power for good in the world? And will not that power be greater than the power of its individual members? What a power a state or nation has when it speaks through its regularly constituted authorities. What a power for good such a state or nation would have if it spoke or acted on Christian principles. One such nation as the United States could bless mankind.

The practical question occurs here, Are there not enough Christian men and women in the United States to transform its character in a day? Could they not, if true to their Master, with a voice as authoritative as his own, cast out all the evil spirits that infest the country? Could intemperance, Sabbath-breaking, secretism, Mormonism, the social evil, or any of the crying evils of our day, resist the might of public opinion, if it were crystalized into law and brought to bear upon them? The great difficulty is, private conscience loses its purity and power when it becomes public. The need of our day is a Christianity true to itself in all the relations of life. If some of our gifted revivalists would take up this point and push it until it would be realized, we should soon see the kingdom of God come among us with power. We have so long looked at the need of personal religion, that we have almost lost sight of the public necessity for it, and some doubt if it has any claim upon our attention.

A POWERFUL APPEAL FOR THE SOUTH.

Editor Christian Cynosure:—There will never be a more favorable time for sending the Cynosure to colored pastors, and for distributing your tracts and books among the colored people of the South than now. The evils of secret societies have become so great in many places that many of the better classes of pastors and other leaders in the churches are alarmed.

Some are already out-spoken in their opposition to them, but there are many others, good men too, who have not the courage to come out and take a positive stand against the societies. All that many of them need to become valuable helpers in turning the people away from secret societies is to be heartened and strengthened, as they would be by reading the Cynosure. They do not know that anybody of any standing and influence is opposing secretism. They have every reason to believe that these secret orders are approved by the the leading men of the country, preachers included, seeing as they do so many prominent white men in them, and never hearing a word against them. It is a surprise, a revelation, to many to learn that so many of the best Christian men and women in the world are not only utterly opposed to all kinds of secret societies and boldly speak and write against them, but have a strong organization for the prosecution of this great reform. This knowledge itself greatly strengthens and encourages them. But when they become strong enough to speak out, they need facts and arguments such as are furnished in your paper and other publications.

In some places the evils of secret societies on the churches have not been experienced. They are just being brought under their baneful influence. Many pastors are thoughtlessly, some selfishly, joining them and helping to influence their members to join them. The church houses are used generally in villages and country places, at first, as the places for the society meetings. In a number of places, in different States, during the past few months, I heard of men who were establishing secret orders among the colored people, where none had existed before. With proper effort to warn the people against them now, multitudes could be saved from their influence.

The lodges everywhere make a special effort to get young men of talent, teachers and professional men, and men who are beginning to make their mark, or who are accumulating property, and who are leaders of sentiment among the colored people, as well as the preachers, to join them, and many are being entrapped, and their influence secured for secretism, who would not go into them if properly instructed as to their nature.

Many other reasons could be given why the Cynosure, by the thousand, and tracts by the million, should be sent into the South at this time.

If only the leaders of the 800,000 colored Baptists were supplied the whole South would be leavened. The effect would be nearly as great if the leaders of the various Methodist bodies were supplied. One hundred dollars now would do more good than thousands will ten years from now, or even five.

There is one other reason that I will mention why the National Christian Association should do more than ever now to circulate literature and help in other ways to push forward this reform in the South. The Association has helped to bring on the battle, and it would be in every way wrong to leave such brethren as pastors Countee, Brinkley, and Imes in Memphis, and brethren in other sections, who are as truly in the fight and suffering because of the stand they have taken, to battle alone. The Association ought, at least, to furnish them ammunition.

A PLEA FOR UNION.

When Prohibition votes were cast only for protest and for conscience their force was but little weakened by division. But when success looms up as one of the possibilities of the near future, division becomes a serious matter.

Such is the situation to-day, and many hearts are aching while they ask, Can the American and Prohibition parties be united?

I know of but one serious difficulty in the way, and that is the question of secrecy. If my memory serves me right, both parties endorse National Reform. Both are prohibition to the core. There might be some heart-burning over the name adopted and over the proper distribution of honors, for we are all human. But I doubt not all this could be arranged without difficulty or delay were the question of secretism disposed of.

Can this difficulty be satisfactorily adjusted?

It is plain that Americans cannot vote for lodgemen to be the rulers of the people. Not because they are stubborn and prejudiced, but simply because they are conscientious. We may plant a stone at this point, and call it one of the "Ancient Landmarks." On the other hand neither principle nor conscience forbids a Prohibitionist to vote for a man who may be entirely free from lodge affiliation. I do not believe that the leaders of that party would usually even prefer that their standard-bearers should be lodge-men.

In view of these facts I will take the liberty to make the following

SUGGESTION:

Let the leaders of the American party address a letter over their united signature to all the leading names in the Prohibition party sending a copy to each one individually, and requesting a reply. Let the letter set forth:

1. Our deep interest in the early success of the prohibition cause.

2. To secure that success we, as a party, are willing to unite with them and be governed by the decisions of the majority in convention assembled, if they will respect our conscientious convictions in only one particular, viz., that adhering lodgemen shall not be endorsed as candidates for office.

3. Will you personally favor such a compromise?

Let the letter and the replies be published. If the union is effected much will be gained. If it is rejected there will be but one course open to us as Americans. We must be true to our principles though the heavens fall. P. S. Feemster.

WHO BIDES HIS TIME.

Who bides his time and day by day
Faces defeat full patiently,
And lifts a mirthful roundelay,
However poor his fortune be—
He will not fall in any qualm
Of poverty—the paltry dime
It will grow golden in his palm,
Who bides his time.

Who bides his time—he tastes the sweet
Of honey in the saltest tear;
And though he fares with slowest feet,
Joy runs to meet him, drawing near;
The birds are heralds of his cause,
And like a never-ending rhyme,
The roadsides bloom in his applause,
Who bides his time.

Who bides his time, and fevers not
In the hot race that none achieve,
Shall wear cool wreathen laurel, wrought
With crimson berries in the leaves,
And he shall reign a goodly king,
And sway his hand o'er every clime,
With peace writ on his signet ring,
Who bides his time.

THE ORDER OF TEMPLARS.

Office of "Tidens Fragor,"
New York, Sept. 25, 1885.

I notice that your paper is against secret societies. You may therefore be pleased to learn of an order that is not secret. As founder of the same, I take pleasure in enclosing the platform of principles.

The order was organized June 16th and 18th, 1883. Some of the ceremonies are copied from the Good Templars, being about half as long and simplified with the obligation of secrecy excluded in each degree. We have three degrees: temple, district, and grand degree. The names of officers are shortened. The ceremonies in each degree can be omitted where preferred and the pledge only used, etc.

So far as I know there is no temperance order in existence, except this one, but they are all secret, and I can see no necessity for it. If a friend wishes to be present there should be no objection.

The Good Templar order (in which I before have been an active worker since 1872) refused at its Right Worthy Grand Lodge session, 1883, in Chicago, to permit the existence of an American-Scandinavian Grand Lodge which Scandinavian lodges in this country should be subordinate, and then ten Scandinavian Good Templar lodges left that order and organized a new organization as above. We believe that our people can work better together for temperance if united under one supreme body on the same principles as the Swedish Lutheran Augustana Synod and other religious bodies are united for Christian work.

When forming this order, we believed and still believe that the time for any great prosperity of secret temperance orders is passed, and that a new order can be founded with the best features of other orders without such secrecy, that may be able to unite all temperance elements into one strong active body. Our order numbers to-day forty-two subordinate temples and four district temples in this country, with nearly 1,200 members. Of these forty-two there are thirty-one Swedish, seven Norwegian, and four Finnish temples. We have also seven temples in Sweden and one in Norway. A Grand Temple will be organized in Sweden in October or November. Our next annual session is held in Chicago, third Monday in July, 1886.

We held a meeting in Boston (extra Grand Temple session) last Monday (Sept. 21st), and public meeting Sept. 20th in memory of the Rush Temperance Centennial. Over 200 Scandinavians were present from New York and the New England States. We have six temples in Illinois, ten in Michigan, and one in Texas. Others so far are in Eastern States. We intend to try and introduce orders among native Americans whenever desired. A resolution adopted in Boston recommends the support of the Prohibition party as the leading one of the future and that the temples hold public political meetings in October. Yours fraternally, is as follows, never to be changed:

A. Peterson.

THE TEMPLARS PLATFORM OF PRINCIPLES

1. To concentrate and unite all acceptable persons, men and women, of any race, language or nationality, who believe in the existence and power of Almighty God, for the purpose of promoting total abstinence and encouraging them to co-operate, politically or otherwise, with all such efforts that have in view the abolition of the license laws and the prohibition of the importation, manufacture and sale of all intoxicating liquors, as a beverage.

2. To assist each other in cases of sickness by establishing a fund for that purpose to be under the charge of each District Temple.

3. To establish a life insurance fund for cases of accidents or deaths to be under the charge of each Grand Temple.

4. To assist each other in obtaining employment by establishing offices for that purpose, wherever possible.

5. To keep the machinery of the order as simplified as possible, only adopting the best features of other organizations. Short ceremonies to be used, or, where preferred, only the pledge.

6. To avoid pledging any member to secrecy in any degree, as this order is not intended as a secret organization, only organized in a similar manner; the members to be the proper judges of what to keep private at their business meetings without any such pledge.

7. To grant "dual" Grand Temple charters to foreign-born residents and citizens, who from a better knowledge of their own people's language and customs, can show they may become more successful by having their own Grand Body, with jurisdiction only over those speaking such language, similar to the system now existing among the principal religious denominations and synods of this country.

8. Uniformity in the work by the use of same kind of charters, constitutions, rituals, and supplies in the subordinate bodies; the most systematic, united and organized efforts being necessary to hasten the hour of complete victory for the great temperance reform and enforce laws relating thereto.

THE GOSPEL, THE VERY HEART OF SOCIAL REFORMS.

The corresponding secretary of the Prison Association of New York, Mr. W. M. F. Round, when at Saratoga some time since, attending the annual meeting of the American Social Science Association, found himself one evening talking with a venerable member of that body in the parlor of the hotel, while the association was holding a session in the adjoining hall. The secretary expressed some surprise that his friend should be absent from the meeting. He replied: "I stayed at home to read a book on social science that furnishes me with a solution of all the problems they discuss there." Nearly all the solutions that have been at all successful in dealing with pauperism, vice and crime, have unconsciously acknowledged their dependence on that same book, the Bible, by the very mottoes they have adopted.

The prison association itself prints on a prominent page of its pamphlets the words of Jesus: "I was in prison and ye came unto me. Secretary Rounds, in a recent article in the Homiletic Review, shows that while the population of New York State has increased "but about twenty per cent," since 1880, the criminals have increased thirty-three per cent, a failure of our prison system which he attributes to the fact that it is not dominated by the principles of the Gospel.

From the same book the Florence Night Mission takes its watchword. Visiting the low dens of New York with its missionary, I heard a young thief, when invited to its evening meeting, reply, "I work nights." Because so many of the devil's employes and some good men "work nights," this mission has been organized for night work, chiefly among fallen women. On one of the pages of its report I find these words: "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him turn unto the Lord and he will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon."

And the new "White Cross Army," whose work is the complement of that just mentioned, to encourage purity of thought and word and deed in boys and young men, takes two of its mottoes from that book: "Keep thyself pure." "Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God." (Its pledge against smutty talk is not superfluous for some who are no longer young men.)

The most successful temperance societies are those whose dependence upon the Christian Gospel are stamped into their very names, and proclaimed by ribbons which speak of the blood of Calvary, and the purity of the pardoned, and the peace of heaven.

The most efficient assault yet made upon pauperism and other problems of poverty, that of charity organization societies, whose motto is, "Not alms, but a friend," is only an application, as the Independent has shown, of an acted parable of the same book, the story of Peter and John at the Gate Beautiful, where instead of giving the beggar the alms he sought they gave him a helping word and a helping hand to set him on his feet, a new man without and within and capable of self-support.

London's best answer to the "bitter cry" of its slums is a campaign of revival all along the line, in which the dignified regulars of the state church have copied, with variations, the tactics of the Salvation Army, and sent their gowned procession of bishops, clergymen, and altar boys, singing litanies through their lowest streets, pausing often for proclamations of the Gospel.

It is a very significant fact that though Free Religionists at their conventions announce it as their lofty mission to provide "properly ventilated and drained houses," in reality not one of the fifty-cent pieces paid for the privilege of hearing these missionary (?) addresses is heard from in the sanitary improvements of our cities. One New York society of Free Religionists has recently shown some interest in tenement house reform, good as far as it goes, but the superintendent of the city missions of New York, who knows more of its charitable work than any other man, is unable to name one charitable institution in the city, of ten years standing, which was instituted and has been supported by those who reject the Bible.

Mr. Ingersoll raised a laugh among his shallow hearers recently by asking, in substance, if a man just come to town found himself in want, would he go for help to a Presbyterian deacon?

It would have been appropriate to answer, "Perhaps not, if, like most infidels, he did not know enough about Christianity to be aware of the fact that deacons disburse the charitable offerings of Christians, but he would surely have asked for a minister not for an infidel." One of the sad facts brought out by the recent biography of George Eliot, whose offences pain us like a sister's, is that she ceased the charitable work to which in her Christian days she had been devoted when she entered the Iceland of infidelity. What the London Atheneum calls "the great lapse that overshadowed her life to the end," could not have continued for a quarter of a century if she had not previously lapsed from her loyalty to the Bible.

Those who reject the Bible are not only incapacitated for charitable work, but also for efficient service in the field of morals. At a recent club dinner, Mr. William Lloyd Garrison, son of the great emancipationist, in answer to the question, "What religion can Liberals give their children?" said, "More than all else that troubles me in the ethical education of my children is the animalism that is engendered by materialistic thought. It would pain me little to have them embrace Calvinism with conscience, compared with entertaining liberal ideas and lax morals."

Of the reform work and the four millions of dollars contributed annually for charities in New York city, Free Religionists doubtless contribute something as individuals, but the bulk of the work and the gifts are from those who have learned social science from the Bible, without whose support New York would have as meagre charities as cultured Rome, before the Gospel put hospitals in the place of arenas and stopped the wholesale abandonment of babes, and the worship of lust.

All successful movements against pauperism, vice and crime, have come at last to the Bible platform that permanent reform cannot be accomplished by a change of surroundings alone, by better clothes or better tenements, but only by a change in the man himself, the displacing of the laziness, cowardice, appetite, and covetousness, which are the roots of degradation, by "work, education, kindness, industrial training in the public schools, and, most of all, the Gospel." "Make the tree good, and his fruit good." Matt. 12: 33.

Mr. C. S. Wingate, the eminent sanitary engineer, says that the surrounnings of the filthy and ignorant in the slums are "foul and unhealthy, not more from necessity than from choice." This Ulyssian crew must be raised from piggishness to manhood, or it is useless to remove them from their pig pens to parlors. When Christ proclaimed his mission of charity to prisoners and unfortunates, the very foundation of his relief work was, "to preach the Gospel to the poor." Luke 4: 17.

At another time he said, "From within, out of the heart of men, proceed evil thoughts, adulteries, fornications, murders, thefts, covetousness, wickedness, deceit, lasciviousness, an evil eye, blasphemy, pride, foolishness." Since the disease is "within," there we must apply the remedy.—Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts in the Union Signal.

HON. RICHARD RUSH ON SECRET SOCIETIES.

EXTRACTS FROM HIS PUBLISHED LETTERS.

WHY OPPOSE THE LODGE.

I see objections to secret societies, because, pursuing objects not known to the public, through means not known to the public, they act under diminished responsibilities to the public. If the objects be good, why not state them? if bad, they ought to be known. Our legislative halls are all open, and our courts; so are all the acts of our people, that may come to affect the interests of the body politic or social. Not a bridge company, not a turnpike company, no bank, scarcely an association of any kind, for whatever purpose existing, whether for the advancement of charity, or learning, or religion, or any of the common business of life, whether incorporated by the laws or not, but renders its statements to the public either voluntary or by command of the laws. If the latter do not positively enjoin publicity, a competent share of information regarding the objects of any such associations, is rarely or ever withheld, on proper inquiry being made. Societies, then, profoundly secret by the first element of their constitution, whatever their ostensible ends, cannot be too closely watched, in a country whose primary principles of political and social action are all in the face of day.

THE MORGAN CASE AND THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

The press on this occasion has fallen into stupefaction, or turpitude; for it cannot so utterly have lost its senses as not to know that the crime would never have been committed and left unavenged, but for the full and continued existence, in our country, of the Masonic obligation. No sophistry can gainsay this position. The evidence of it is flagrant; its foundation is upon a rock. Had a case like Morgan's arisen in 1776; had blood been so atrociously shed, and gone so long unavenged, through any acts of the government then ruling us, or the black doings and subtle hidings of Masonry within its borders, I believe that it would have acted upon public opinion like an electric shock, and that our fathers would have sought no stronger cause for prostrating in the dust an open authority or secret influence that could so iniquitously prostrate justice. Am I wrong? Do I affirm too much? Am I giving way to feeling, in place of reasoning? No! I speak under the highest of all sanctions, before the American public. Turn to the Declaration of Independence, that glorious charter of our liberties, and see if it be not there recorded as one of the causes for dismembering an empire, that the British King, by his odious acts, had obstructed the administration of justice in our country. No single case, comparable in atrocity to this of Morgan's, whether as regards the original conspiracy and murder, or the total obstruction of the laws since, ever disgraced the tyranny of that era over us.

LODGE AGAINST LAW.

I am in a field by itself. There my astonished sight beholds two figures: the State, with the broken sceptre of the law in her hand, on one side, and Masonry, with a veil over her face, on the other. My vision is distinct though the spectacle is so portentious! I go not beyond the narrative that presents it. Keeping to that, I am guarded against mistake or confusion. I have here immoveable ground under me. I take post as upon the verity of a legal record. A few facts are all that I want, and these I have. I desire to render the case irresistible, by its concentration and its simplicity. I believe that Morgan was seized and carried from his home by Masons, and by Masons murdered. I believe that this was the result of a conspiracy, engendered and carried through, under circumstances of peculiar deliberation, malignity and terror. Yet, to this very hour, the infamous deed remains unpunished. I have watched the pursuit of justice. I see how she is disheartened, fatigued, worn down, by efforts continued throughout years, to clutch these worse than Calabrian banditti. I see her at fault: I see her countenance in despair. Masons know the whole tale of blood. Who can deny this? Masons conceal it. Who can deny this? Can, then, any sentient, reasonable being say, that Masonry is not at the bottom of the evil? True, these are depraved Masons who act in this manner, and I do not mean to judge all other Masons by them; but Masonry, corporate, existent Masonry, is the root. The abandoned fiends of the order, who know the truth, conceal it on system. They are wicked through principle. They confound crime with virtue; murder with Masonic merit. Like imps of pandemonium, they rejoice and dance in their sin.

How, gentlemen, can my zeal in Antimasonry abate? I take from one of the letters of William Penn, the great founder of this Commonwealth, the following sentence: "that a government is free to the people under it, when they are party to the laws, and when the laws govern." This is a fine axiom in a republic, expressed with clearness and brevity. But who can say that the laws govern while Masonry exists? True, that in a thousand cases occurring all around us, the administration of law goes fairly on, and we never hear of Masonry obstructing it, or anything about Masonry; why, then, it may be asked, any alarm about it? But what does this prove more than that it is harmless, as long as its belligerent spirit is not called out; but excite that spirit, tell the secrets of the institution, bring it, by any means, into conflict with the laws, and who that has examined the case of Morgan but must see it is stronger than the laws? Hence Anti-masonry.

ONE DEGREE ENOUGH FOR MR. RUSH.

Many years ago I became an "entered apprentice," went to a lodge once—and but once. On my return from England, after an absence in the service of the United States, I voluntarily withdrew from the body, by a letter to that effect. My separation from it was in 1826, before the murder of Morgan was known to me, and had no connection with the just indignation which that deed excited among a portion of the citizens of New York.

THE REASON FOR THE AMERICAN PARTY.

The only concern that society at large can have with Masonry politically, is on the ground of its doing a positive injury to society. What its predilections may incite it to cherish in theory or enact in practice, within its own walls, those outside need not care about. Let it employ itself as any other benevolent, or festive, or theological brotherhood, if any or all such it constitutes, with its own duties and pastimes, as long as it keeps within its own limits. But the line must never be passed. It exists permissively, under the license of society. The continuance of its charter depends upon its innocent conduct. This must be unequivocal and invariable. There must be no exception collaterally, any more than directly. The moment it is discovered that persons belonging to this brotherhood can conspire against the liberty and life of a citizen who had broken no law of the land, but merely some of its own edicts, and when these persons can escape detection by persuading themselves that the voluntary oaths and other self-assumed obligations which bind them to the brotherhood are of higher authority than the laws, no matter under what mistaken notions of those oaths and obligations they act, from that moment the whole institution, from which such rank delusions and tremendous perils proceed, assumes a new relation to society. It is placed in the attitude of an aggressor. It rides over the laws. It is guilty; constructively if you will, but obviously and legally guilty.

Hooker, personifying law, eloquently exclaims, "her seat is the bosom of God, her voice the harmony of the world; everything on earth does her homage, the highest as not beyond her control, the least as claiming her protection." Masonry has overset this primordial system. She has dethroned this image of God upon earth. To reinstate it over so insolent a victor, we must have a political organization. There is no other way of assaulting, there is no other hope of vanquishing, there need be no other dream of humbling such a foe. It fights with desperation. It murdered Morgan by force of its oaths; it beat down the law by force of its oaths; and, like any other murderer on trial for life, it will resort to every means that these same oaths can engender, to escape the doom it deserves. It is itself an organization the most tremendous, and for political as well as other purposes, when it may see fit to aim at them, though this, as many things besides, be kept out of its written code. It is, therefore, incontestibly proper to attack it politically.

MASONRY AND MURDER.

The Rev. Dr. Cathcart, of York, a learned and enlightened clergyman, kept an account of all the murders in the United States in 1831, and found that they amounted, as far as he could ascertain, to one hundred and nine. The fear is that this list fell below rather than exceeded the truth, as he put down none of which he had not an account. Others may have been committed that escaped him; but his aggregate, which I must add did not include those of the Southampton insurrection, or the individuals killed in the public affray in Rhode Island, probably exceeds the whole number of murders in both France and England for that year. The number in the latter country for seven years, ending with 1830, appears by their parliamentary returns, to have been one hundred and three or about fifteen for each year. What American, solicitous for the reputation of his country, but must feel deeply at a difference so amazing; however, the sum total of all other offenses may place those in our land at a lower point in the comparison. I do not charge Masonry with swelling up this appalling amount of murders, because it murdered Morgan; but I say unequivocally, and I say it careless of fresh abuse, that if any one thing could tend more than another to lessen the salutary horror with which that highest of crimes ought ever to be regarded in every community, it was the behavior of our presses under the murder of Morgan.

MASONRY AND POLITICS.

The defenders of Masonry allege that it is not political. Where do they suppose our senses to have fled when they say so? It may not be political by its express constitution, or any of its formal rules, but if it be not so in fact—if it be not so by its influence—there is no truth under heaven. It can vanquish the law, and silence the press, yet it is not political! It can tower over the first, which holds the body politic together—it can stop the second, by which the political universe is moved—yet it is not political!! This is to mock, not reason with us; it takes us for blocks—stones—not able to see what is before our eyes. And since Masonry has already done all that I have enumerated who so dull in thought or willful in infatuation, as not to feel sure that it will, in some form or other, go on with its foul transgressions as occasion may incite, if permitted longer to have foothold in the land. I thence lay it down with a confidence that in my mind admits of no qualification, that the multiplied and proven dangers of Masonry, render the effort for its extirpation the highest public duty which our citizens can be summoned to perform at the approaching election of a President.

OHIO NOTICE.

The committee appointed at the late meeting of the Ohio Christian Association, held at Cedarville to arrange for a State Lecturer who should spend at least two months in the field prior to the meeting that is to be held at Columbus, beginning Dec. 15, have chosen Mr. W. B. Stoddard, who has labored with success for the past two years in the State of New York. He begins his work in Ohio the 15th of October. FROM THE GENERAL AGENT.

Altona, Ill., Oct. 5, 1885.

On Friday evening, the 2d inst., I attended a gathering of the young people in Bro. Lindeblad's church and obtained a few subscribers for the Cynosure. I reached Galva Saturday morning, and calling on Rev. Mr. Borg, found that arrangements were completed and notices given in the papers for me to speak in the Swedish Lutheran church on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings. Spending a few hours with my sister and friends, I came on to this place at 3 P. M., and was heartily welcomed by Bro. Abrahamson, who was at the time suffering with a severe attack of sick headache, and was on that account unable to attend the evening meeting. I learned with regret that our true and efficient helper, Geo. D. Mackintosh, was absent, but soon found Bro. Hubbell, whose invitation to spend the night at his house I gladly accepted. The pastor of the Congregational church received me kindly and was, I noticed, with his wife in the evening congregation.

Saturday evening was not favorable for attendance from the country on account of a slight rainfall and "thick darkness," but there were present I should judge nearly a hundred and twenty-five persons, to whom I spoke for an hour. The M. E. church here has for the past year been supplied by a professor from Hedding College, Abingdon, on whom I called just before time for the Sabbath morning service, and whose invitation to preach I accepted. The audience was not large, but very attentive, and I regretted not being able to remain to "class meeting" on account of an engagement nine miles away in Wataga at 2:30 P. M.

The attendance at Wataga was good, and I was much encouraged to see the deep interest and full attendance in the Sabbath school that was in session when we arrived. This is one of pastor Abrahamson's mission outposts, and is in a prosperous condition, and has a very commodious house of worship.

A brisk ride of eighteen miles behind a fleet horse in the bracing air gave me an excellent relish for the cup of tea and a "No. 1" lunch that sister Abrahamson had thoughtfully provided, and I went to the work of the evening feeling "good as new." The choir sang "with the spirit and with the understanding" apparently, and after prayer and reading 2d Thessalonians 2: 7–12, I spent an hour and a half endeavoring to show that a man could not be a Christian and a true Freemason or Odd-fellow at the same time. The attention was marked and the order perfect.

One incident I should have mentioned. At the close of my remarks on Saturday evening a gentleman who had taken seven degrees and was a "Royal Arch" at one time, came forward to correct one error which I had inadvertently made in giving the ritual of the first degree. I had quoted from Mackey's Ritualist, page 22: "There he stands on the * * threshold of this new Masonic life," etc., which as he understood I gave as part of the initiatory ceremony; with this exception he said my representations were correct. I am encouraged by the hearty approval of pastor A. and other friends of the work thus far, and trust that this evening's gathering may be more largely attended and spiritual and helpful to the pastor in his work than any preceding.

Galva, Oct. 8.—My third and last meeting at Altona was a better one than the two preceding, though the rain kept many from the country away. Bro. Abrahamson showed me every possible kindness and will present our cause and give his people an opportunity to aid in its support next Sabbath morning. This I find a very needy field, though so far as the Ameriean population is concerned not as hopeful as could be desired. I was glad to see the faces of several friends of olden times in the audience the first evening, and among them Rev. Mr. Harrah, with prominent members of his church. Here, as at Altona and Moline, dark and unpleasant weather prevailed, greatly diminishing the attendance from the regions round about; but all things considered, the audience was fair and the attention good.

Yesterday I spent with one of the pioneers, who, if she was not my mother, I would mention as a noteworthy exception to the common infirmities of our "fast age." In her 91st year, she retains her memory and faculties in great clearness, and when we were out calling, she would enter and alight from the carriage unaided with more ease and expedition than many who were born half a century after she began to spin and weave in her New England home.

Last evening the churches held their regular prayer-meeting services, which doubtless accounted for the absence of some, but there was very little vacant space in the audience room, and those present remained for two hours without any apparent diminution of interest. When opportunity was given by the pastor for any who desired to aid in our work there was a cheerful response; and judging from the number of small coins the offering was general as well as liberal. I felt that not only a good work had been done in Galva, bnt as a gentleman present from a neighboring town subscribed for the Cynosure, its weekly visits for one year may prepare the way for light to enter that place of lodge darkness.

Bro. Abrahamson's congregation meet in the largest house of worship in Altoona, but finding it already too small for their growing membership they are talking and planning for a new structure. The present membership is reported at 490.

Bro. Borg's house of worship is not as large as some others in Galva, but is neat and substantially built of brick, with ample ground for enlargement. He reports a present membership of 140.

Both these pastors are radical temperance men, though Bro. Abrahamson is hoping more from the Repnblican party than the facts seem to warrant. There is one featnre noticeable in all these Swedish Lutheran anti-lodge chnrches, viz: they contain about the natural proportion of male and female members. Pastors in lodge-harboring churches often tell me that they fail to reach the younger men, and that the prayer meeting, if not the church roll, is almost entirely made up of old men and women, and it is refreshing to find a people who are not dependent on the "rejected material" of the lodges for attendants and workers in the chnrch. When these men become more thoroughly instructed they will speak with the voice and votes of freemen in tones that will penetrate even the deaf ears of political demagogues.

The Swedish Mission movement has not met with the hoped-for snccess either in Altona or Galva as yet. In both these towns they have houses of worship which are, I am told, nnoccupied at present.

TO THE FRIENDS IN OHIO.

Chicago, Ill., Oct. 10, 1885.

Dear Friends:—By the time this will reach yon, I will, D. V., be in your State prepared for work, and I want yon to get just as much as yon can, while I am with you.

You will see a notice of my appointment in this paper. I take this opportunity to thank those of yon who have so nobly assisted in the past, and ask your co-operation in the present, which I am sure you will give. If yon do, and we all take hold of the work together, there is no reason why we should not see the cause of God and humanity advanced, and the powers of darkness driven back.

I shall go immediately to Columbus, as this is the place you have designated for your State meeting to be held Dec. 15th, next. I shall hope to see all the friends in the neighboring towns and speak whenever you can find a church or school-honse open for the trnth on this question. If you have a Mason in your community who is willing to debate the question on any moral or religious ground, I will meet him at any suitable place for such discussion.

Will Robert Boyd of Reynoldsburg,
Rev. George Riehey of Pataskala,
John Swiekard of Hope,
Mrs. L. L. Ducher of Lewis Center,
F. M. Gardner of New California,
I. S. Williams of Ostrander,
E. Pfeiffer of Delaware,
J. B. Lyons of Mt. Gilead,
L. Powers of Ashley,

Will all who are ready for lecturers or who may desire them later, in any part of the State, write me immediately, so that I may be able to arrange a series of lectures without going over the ground twice. Please state the time that will be the most convenient.

My address will, until further notice, be at Columbus, Franklin county, Ohio.

FROM THE KANSAS AGENT.

Oct. 6, 1885.

Dear Editor:—Having attended the State Convention in Iowa at West Branch, and the Kansas State Convention at Willis, after leaving the lecturer's conferenee at Wheaton, I did not get home till the 5th of September, and have by various things been hindered, so I did not get into the lecture work till the 27th of September. Since then I have been at work, preaching once, lecturing twice. I failed to get a hearing at one other place, on account of a cold rain just at the time for gathering.

On Sabbath evening last I spoke on the Religion of Freemasonry at Strawberry school-house, showing from Masonic authority, and the Christian Bible, that there is an eternally uncompromising antagonism existing betwcen the Masonic science of religion (as Mackey terms it,) and the Christian system; and that the abominations spoken of in Ezekiel 8th chapter, degree below degree, of still greater and greater darkness, in the worship of "the sun toward the East," was the great ideal from which the symbols of modern Freemasonry were copied. As Mackey says: "Many, indeed all of the Masonic symbols of the present day, can only be thoroughly comprehended and properly appreciated by this reference to sun worship."

Quite an interest was manifested after the lecture, and I am pressingly invited to come again, and also to speak in another school-house about three miles east, and some material aid is promised.

I have spoken to some at every place in regard to a county organization, and the idea was favorably received by all. I shall make a vigorous effort after our (U. B.) conference, which meets at our church to-morrow, to get a Washington county anti-secrecy organization effected. I think of trying, where I have two or more appointments for evening leetures, to have day appointments for prayer, conferenee and inquiry. Pray for me that the Lord may direct and give increase.

R. Loggan.

IOWA.

BRO. HAWLEY'S FAITH AND ZEAL.

Dear Cynosure:—On Wednesday, the 23rd of September, I came to Quasqueton, in Buchanan county. The second night I exposed the deistical and Satanic character of the lodge religion and defended the claim of Christ to be the one only name by which we can be saved. Here I met my old friend John Merrill. I formed his acquaintance when engaged in revival work in Buchanan county twenty-seven years ago. He is a veteran reformer and was delighted with the truth, and anxious that it should be preached at his regular place of worship which is several miles distant from Quasqueton.

Sabbath, the 27th, I preached morning and evening in the village of Walker. Here, also, I exposed the Satanic methods of salvation taught by the lodge, and preached Christ and his atoning blood as the only way to God. The Sabbath evening sermon was preached in the Free Methodist church. The pastor heartily sympathizes with our reform work, and the brethren joyfully received the truth; as did the Wesleyan Methodist friends to whom I preached in the morning.

It is, however, but a few years since the misguided friends of the lodge in this place replied to my arguments against the validity of the Masonic oaths with eggs and stones. But they must have felt that those methods were neither convincing nor winning, and so listened in silence this time.

The next week I spent in distributing Anti-masonic literature, and in attending the Annual Conference of the Iowa Wesleyan Methodists. Upon the cars I met a pastor who does not teach separation from the lodge to Christ, but contents himself with warning the lodge men not to attempt to climb by the Masonic ladder to heaven. I earnestly improved the time in teaching him the way of the Lord more perfectly.

Twice I addressed the Wesleyan conference on the subject of our reform. This conference passed a resolution approving of the proposed National Convention of Christians and churches opposed to secret societies and elected delegates to the coming convention.

Sabbath morning I preached a sermon in the United Brethren church on the ability of Christ to save, in which I exposed the lying pretensions of the lodge to fit men, by Masonic methods, for heaven. In the evening I preached before the Wesleyan Conference on Christ the only way to God as opposed to the false ways of Satan as taught by the lodge men, and urged upon the pastors the duty of faithfully instructing and warning the people. I expect the hearty co-operation of the Free and Wesleyan Methodists in the work of Christian reform. Christ expects every friend of his to stand with him in this contest with the Masonic anti-Christ. Christ claims to be the only way to God; Masonry rejects Christ by teaching another way to heaven. If any man does that, says the inspired Paul, "let him be accursed."

PERSONAL MENTION.

—Bro. A. H. Springstein has removed from Warren, Michigan, to Wayne, Wayne county, in the same State. Correspondents will please note the change and send for him to lecture.

—Rev. W. T. Gordon of Albany, Missouri, brother-in-law of Bro. M. N. Butler, having been compelled to give up the ministry, for the time being, because of the failure of his eyesight, is about engaging in business in this city. He reports as strong determination as ever against the lodge in Northwestern Missouri, but at present little activity in their opposition.

—Rev. T. L. Wilkinson, editor of the Iconoclast of Brantford, province of Ontario (now changed to the Golden Rule, Parkdale, Ont.), has been called to pass through the deep waters of affliction. During the last of August his youngest child, a sweet little girl of about seven years, was attacked with diphtheria. The disease was quickly fatal. The five older children were also prostrated immediately, and soon the father. In a few days a boy of about ten was taken and then a girl of sixteen. Thus bereft of half their little flock Bro. Wilkinson and his devoted wife have taken up again the labor of life with a sorrow whose depths their own hearts alone can fathom, yet sustained and comforted by the presence of Him who gave and who taketh away, whose name they bless out of the gloom of their trial. The readers of the Cynosure, who have become acquainted with this brother through extracts made from his paper, will join us in this expression of tenderest sympathy for the bereaved family.

—Bro. Edward Mathews visited the Illinois Free Methodist Conference meeting in Chicago last week. Our readers have been informed from time to time of his trial in Coldwarter, Michigan, for compelling an officer to show his warrant for the arrest of a brother minister. The judge, at first apparently prejudiced against Bro. Mathews, before the close of the trial as the facts came out showed plainly his change of conviction, and reserved the sentence for some days after the report of the jury. The case will be appealed, but Bro. Mathews is a poor preacher and has little means to spend in the trial. Some of his many friends who read the Cynosure can do good with their money in this way.

—The Assoeiation for the Advancement of Women met at Des Moines, Iowa, on the afternoon of Oct. 7th. The attendance was large and included many of the most noted women of the nation. Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, as president, made the opening address. This was followed by an essay on "The Work of the World's Women," by Mrs. Wolcott, of Massachusetts. Miss Francis E. Willard, of Illinois, then ably sketched the plan of successfully organized work as illustrated by the methods of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Among the distinguished guests reported as present were Mrs. Emma C. Bascom, of Wiseonsin; Dr. Julia H. Smith, of Chicago; Mrs. Abby W. May, of Boston; Mrs. Clara B. Colby, of Nebraska.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LOYAL UNITED BRETHREN TO THE RESCUE.

Dear Brethren in the Lord:

One of our vital principles is assailed by a crafty foe. "To the breach, dear frieuds!" Our Sumpter has been fired ou and many are ready to sacrifice "the ancient landmark, which thy fathers have set." For the sake of peace, aud the false uotion—that "perhaps they'll do more harm than good," many of our good brethren are deceived, and are willing to compromise. Let us orgauize in the uame of the Lord of Hosts, that "the weak hands may be strengthened, aud the feeble knees confirmed." "Say to them that are of a fearful heart: Be strong, fear not, behold your God will come with veugeance, even God with a recompense: he will come and save you." Let us organize that we may present an unbroken front to the foe. Why shall uot our every confereuce be represented in "The Conference of Churches?" Let our classes organize into a Defence Association and elect a delegate to meet delegates from every charge on each presiding elder's district at some central point on the district; to be known as the ——— District Convention of Coustitutional United Brethreu in Christ. After transacting business for the sustentatiou of our Coustitution, let them elect four delegates from their district (of preachers or laymen or both) to meet similar delegates from the other districts throughout the church at a convenient point. That conventiou to direct the constitutional organization for the church. I also suggest, that as soon as possible after the preacher is assigned, that the constitutioual brethren of that field wait upon him, and shonld he declare for the Weaver wing, or is weak on the question, that the amount that he would get if loyal from each member be put into a commou fund to fight this evil. Brethren, dallying now means weakening of our cause. I understand that since the passing of the lodge-appeasing act by our last General Conference, a member of the class I lead has joined the G. A. R. and we are powerless to help ourselves.

Exchange ideas, brethren. J. C. Young.

HALF-WAY ANTI-MASON.

Seymour Lake, N. Y.

Editor Cynosure:—Dear Brother. There was in the Cynosure of Sept. 17th, a sharp reproof to correspondents, which, if I listened to the human instead of the divine, I would dare not pen these lines. What God wants me to write, that I write; if it goes into the waste basket I have done my duty.

I find many men who cry aloud against Masonry; they can tell off from the first to the third degree, and point out many of the evils contained therein; tell us how Masonry is corrupting society, demoralizing the churches, corrupting our government,—in fact they have the outward form of a zealous Antimason. But ask one of them for a dollar to help on the cause, or a few dollars to help some poor seceder out of trouble—Oh how soon their countenance will change; their zeal collapse.

Now what we want in the Anti-masonic ranks is men filled with the Holy Ghost, endowed with power from on high: then the good work will go on. It is only through the power of God that Freemasonry will ever be put down. Give us men filled with the spirit of Christ, who are all consecrated to the work, then the Masonic kingdom will totter. Men whose pocket-books are open for the cause prove their faith. God help the National Christian Association and keep it pure. D. Benjamin.

AN INVITATION TO LECTURERS.

Lexington, Ill.

In this vicinity where the secret orders have full sway, controling everything, the churches included, we much need the assistance of an able worker in our midst. About one year ago Elder Browne spent a few days with us, visiting in town and country. The weather being unfavorable we made no attempt to get up an audience. Brother Hinman spent two weeks with us in November, visiting the same ground over, doing a noble work. He lectured twice in Lexington and had a small, but attentive audience. At Selma he gave two lectures, and had quite a respectable audience; and he spoke once in the country where we met with the greater encouragement but it rained so that the people could not get out. Now if there is any place on the earth where the subject of secretism should be agitated and its evils revealed, it is McLean county, Illinois, in Lexington especially. I can give so little encouragement that I hardly dare ask or expect further aid from the N. C. A.; but in case there should be a lecturer passing by, or near this place and will favor us with a call, sooner or later, I'll meet them at the depot, will convey them around, and will entertain them while they see fit to remain. Twelve or fifteen years ago Bro. C. A. Blanchard lectured here, and he gave the fraternity such a stirring up that the Masons allude frequently to it. I have some acquaintance with Bro. Stoddard, but it is not for me to dictate who, but will say, send a good one or none, as the prejudice is bitter against us here. Yours in the work.

Wm. D. Johnston.

PITH AND POINT.

THE G. A. R., AND THE RUM POWER.

The following record is from the Era of Bradford, Pennsylvania, of Sept. 29th, 1885:

"G. A. R. Resolutions.—At a meeting of Bradford Post, No. 141, Dep't. of Pa., G. A. R, held last Wednesday evening, the following resolution was adopted: Resolved, that the thanks of the Post are due and are hereby tendered to Messrs. A. Mayer & Co., for their generous gift of the life-like bust of our late commander and comrade, General U. S. Grant; and that Post 141 will ever hold them in grateful remembrance for the gift. By order,

R. A. Dempsey, Commander.

Chas. F. Cummings, Adjutant.

A. Mayer & Co. are wholesale liquor dealers in Bradford, and the query is, how much did the G. A. R. action in Maine soften the hearts of these liquor men? How many dollars will Post 141 put into A. Meyer's coffers?

A WIDOW'S MITE AND BLESSING.

I wish I was able to send you much more, but am glad to be able to help you a little in the good work of sending the Cynosure South. It is surely God's messenger and he will bless its truths to those who receive and read it. May God's blessing be upon all who are working in this reform.—Mrs. M. W. Bingham, Mallet Creek, O.

HOW STANDS DR. LEONARD?

Please allow me to ask through your valuable paper if the Prohibition candidate for Governor of Ohio, Dr. Leonard, is a member of either the Odd-fellows or Freemasons? My reason for asking the above question is I will not knowingly vote for a man for office that belongs to either of those orders. I do not consider a man after taking such oaths as a fit man to hold office. He is in danger of being placed in a situation where he would be compelled to violate one or the other of the oaths he has taken. We have no American ticket in our State, or I would not think of voting any other. I think the Cynosure the best paper printed.—T. W. Stewart, Bellecenter, Ohio.

Dr. Leonard, we understand, is not a Freemason, but joined the Odd-fellows years ago. How much interest he takes in the lodge we know not, but hope little or none. Members of the nominating convention raised the question of his lodge affiliation, and we believe were satisfied with his present standing. Write to him and learn directly how he stands.

STUDIES IN THE KINGS AND PROPHETS.

LESSON IV. Oct. 25, 1885.—The Temple Repaired. 2 Kings 12: 1–15.

GOLDEN TEXT.—I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go into the house of the Lord. Ps. 122: 1.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

COMMENTS ON THE LESSON BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. Children trained in the fear of God will make God-fearing rulers. vs. 1, 2. The young king Joash is a fine example of the value of early training. There is no reason to suppose that with the blood of the house of Ahab in his veins he would have turned out better than the kings who preceded him had it not been for that combination of circumstances which made the good Jehoiada the sole guardian and teacher of his childish years. Our greatest national danger lies in the fact that such a large proportion of our children and youth are allowed to grow up without any moral or religious education worth the name. The virtues of the Puritan age have become nearly extinct in our public men, simply because the Puritan home with its strict discipline and daily grounding of the children in Bible truth, has become almost obsolete. Perhaps no reformation is more needed than one which shall begin at our own firesides in a revival of the old-fashioned home training.

2. A true reformation will begin at God's house. vs. 3–15. In the great national declension, the temple had been suffered to fall into a state of general neglect and dilapidation. Joash perceived the duty of repairing the sacred edifice, strange as it seems, before Jehoiada did, and issued a command that a national subscription should be taken up for this purpose, yet at the end of twenty-three years not the first step had been taken towards this important work. The third verse gives one prime reason for this general apathy, "the high places were not taken away." Just in proportion as these high places were frequented the temple worship declined. In our own day there is the same rivalry between these man-chosen shrines and the house of God. Any standard Masonic writer will inform us that the lodge always meets in an upper room to copy the example of their ancient brethren who met to worship on hills. Thus we have in our midst literal "high places" on which are expended the money, the interest, the affection which should be given to the church. As a consequence "the breaches of the Lord's house" grow larger and larger, and even our Jehoiadas seem to have no conception of the real cause. A complete tearing down of these high places would have saved such a tax on the king's patience. The honesty of the master workmen shows that this was indeed a revival of national righteousness such as our own nation sadly needs. It is time that moral issues should be brought to the front. Politics divorced from religion and morals, will grow like stagnant waters—a fountain of public corruption infecting all officials from the highest to the lowest.

LIGHT FROM THE WORD.

Why is early training so important? Pr. 22: 6. Were high places ever used for true worship? Gen. 21: 33. What made them sinful? Num. 33: 52.

"Began to reign." When he was seven years old (2 Chron. 24: 1). He was the eighth king of Judah, and son of Ahaziah, and hence a great grandson of Ahab. For many years Joash was naturally very much under the influence of Jehoiada; and during this period his reign was an excellent and prosperous one. The very first act of Jehoiada, in the king's name, was to bind the people to the abolishment of the worship of Baal, and the restoration of the worship of Jehovah. In the excitement of the revolution, the people, in a great mob flew to the temple of Baal, and tore it down and killed its priest. Forthwith Jehoiada, in the king's name, re-organized the temple service, so that his worship, which had been falling into decay through three reigns, might be conducted in a more fitting manner. But the building itself had become ruinous, owing to neglect and the depredations which had been made upon it by idolaters and invaders. The king therefore early directed his attention to its restoration.—Todd.

"But the high places." The unlawful altars of Jehovah built in groves upon hilltops. The Israelities found that all prominent points had been consecrated by the former inhabitants for idol worship, and they used the same localities in the Jehovah worship. The idol worship was full of the vilest impurity, and it was perhaps impossible to worship Jehovah purely amidst the suggestions of the former impurity which these high places called up. Therefore there were strict commands to destroy them (Lev. 26: 30; Num. 33: 52; Deut. 33: 29).—Schaff.

"Were not taken away." (1) Perhaps the king and the high priest did not realize that these were forbidden. (2) The true God was worshiped upon them, although in a wrong way. (3) Possibly they were unable to take them away,—or feared to go farther in their reforms than they had already done, lest they excite revolts among the people.—Peloubet. The popular fondness for the private and disorderly rites performed in the groves and recesses of hills was so inveterate that even the most powerful monarchs had been unable to accomplish their suppression.—J., F. and B.

"The need of reformation." God's spiritual temple, the church, is sometimes neglected and needs reformation. That money, and time, and thought, which should be devoted to religion and the spread of the Gospel, is transferred to the temple of Mammon. Prayer and the reading of the Bible declines, in private, and in the family; meetings are poorly attended; few are invited to Christ; worldliness prevails.—Peloubet.

"The priests had not repaired the breaches." It is not common for people to be very enthusiastic in spending for the public good the income they need themselves, when those for whom it is done will not give their part. Then there was the difficulty of determining what part of the money should be appropriated to the repairs, and what to the support of the priests and the ordinary temple expenses. In truth Joash had set the priests a hard task; he required them to take the funds for repairing out of their own income, and they not unnaturally found difficulty in settling the proportions—Tayler Lewis. If they had trusted God and the people more, and repaired the temple, more income would have come in. People are not apt to give freely where all that is given is absorbed in the expenses of the collection. They must see worthy results of their self-denial to stimulate their benevolence.—Pel.

"And the priests . . . put therein all the money." A contribution-box should always be one of the attractions of the Lord's house. We ought to go to church to give as well as to get. Praying and singing in a church mean but little from a person who is unwilling to give anything into the Lord's treasury. In making choice of a church home, it is well to look out for one where the contribution-box is always open and always prominent.—H. C. Trumbull.

"They reckoned not with the men." For they trusted implicitly in their honesty. But this work has a strange ending. Joash himself in his later years not only favored idolatry, but took from the temple the very treasures he had placed there with the surplus money, and gave them as a bribe to Hazael, the king of Syria (2 Kings 12: 17, 18).

A Wonderful Woman, A Wonderful Life, AND A Wonderful Book.

Laura S. Haviland is a quiet, gentle, unassuming Quaker woman, 76 years of age, yet vigorous, who has had a remarkable career of usefulness, and has now given to the world a remarkable history of her "Life Work" as a teacher, at an early day, of the colored refugees in Canada and in Michigan, and in other States, as a traveler down South in the guise of a "berry picker," helping out into freedom many slaves; as a nurse and preacher to the sufferers in hospitals during the war; and with Gov. St. John and Flizabeth Comstock, relieving the destitute and suffering refugees in Kansas, etc.

Her book is neither fiction nor founded on fiction, but is an interesting narration of facts of a most thrilling character, as every one will find and testify who will get and read her book, now on sale at the Cynosure office, 221 W. Madison St., Chicago, Ill. Price, cloth, $1,75; half Russia, $2.25.

AMERICAN PLATFORM.

ADOPTED AT CHICAGO, JUNE 20, 1884.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled condition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clannishness by which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile bands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruption, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; and having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and believing the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, both inevitable and indispensable:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, believing with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; believing in the Christian marriage, and not in Mormonism; believing in the religious democracy of the New Testament, and not in the despotism of the lodge; believing, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, not in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we abhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscience by human laws and penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly believe that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike foes to human liberty and welfare. We further most firmly believe that a government without God has none but lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a mere usurpation, we regard all religions and worships invented by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as mere swindling impositions and cheats. We believe in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly believe that the bravery and blood of our soldiers have bought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will be just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised by the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon be not only echoed by their voices, but sustained by their votes.

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following, as containing a brief synopsis of the principles of our government, by which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.

2. That the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.

3. That God requires, and man needs a Sabbath.

4. We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.

5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited hy law.

6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to benefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.

7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punishment of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.

8. We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage.

9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be preserved inviolate, and the same equality should he extended to Indians and Chinamen.

10. That international differences should be settled by arbitration.

11. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.

12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.

13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.

14. That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.

15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

The Christian Cynosure.

EDITORS.

J. BLANCHARD. HENRY L. KELLOGG

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1885.

READ WITH CARE two articles in this number, "A Powerful Appeal for the South" and "A Plea for Union." They are both excellent and from Mississippians by nativity or choice. The senior editor of the Cynosure has in contemplation making a tour through the South this autumn or winter, to see what can be done, and to speak where good audiences can be had, prior to the proposed General Evangelical convention. Will Bro. Woodsmall of Iuka, Mississippi, and others, write to the Cynosure whether meetings can be had with them, or in Memphis and New Orleans?

PRES. C. A. BLANCHARD of Wheaton College has read Mrs. Haviland's "Life Work," and thinks it makes a stronger impression against slavery than did "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

THE KETTLE SINGS BEFORE IT BOILS, and the country now on the subject of secret societies is in the condition of that kettle. Old conservative papers, like the Vermont Chronicle, are now attacking the swarms of secret orders because they are disintegrating the churches by drawing the men and money out of them, and leaving the women to do the paying and praying.

THE COLUMBUS INDEX (Miss.) gives the case of a colored preacher, H. H. Milburn, senteuced six years to the penitentiary for embezzling $400, money belonging to a secret society called "The Seven Stars," and made up of both sexes, of which Milburn was treasurer. The South everywhere swarms with such societies, constructed on the principle of villainy and scoundrelism. The American Misionary Association is short this year. Between two aud three thousand Congregational churches have contributed nothing to its treasury. Nearly every Christian denomination has missions for the ex-slaves; yet how few of those colored churches exclude members of secret societies! But until they do so their work is a failure. The secret societies suck out all vitality and spirituality from them. Such churches are not worth supporting, and the wonder is that sensible people give them support.

THE ARKANSAS BAPTIST, (Little Rock) Oct. 1, asks why colored people have a school house costing but $2,500, while the whites have one costing $15,000, and answers, "Because white people put their money into school houses, and colored people put theirs INTO SOCIETIES." The Baptist is a bright, well-edited paper, taking enlarged and just views of things. It extracts from the Century a Southern woman's letter urging Southern ladies to teach colored schools, and rebukes the ostracism with which Northern women have been visited for teaching such schools. This is good sense as well as good religion.

IT IS SIMPLY AMAZING that intelligent, educated men should complain of preaching the terrors of God's law as harsh. There is more terror in the words of Christ than ever human lips uttered. Instance. "In hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torment;" and, "For I am tormented in this flame!"

SMALL-POX MOBS in Montreal to resist vaccination by French Catholics, one would think, must open the eyes of men to the uselessness of priests and their teaching. Ever since Quebec was founded in 1608, one year after Jamestown, Va., and twelve years before Puritans founded New England, the Canadian French have been as clay in the hands of priests; and they are now, after 277 years' tuition, fighting a remedy tried and accepted by the civilized world. Christ "hath an unchanging priesthood." All true human priests pointed to and ended in him. Heb. 7: 24. So that all priests, since Christ, are usurpers and counterfeits, and the lodge reveals their true nature. They are antagonists and rivals of Christ.

IF THE GENERAL CONVENTION OF ANTI-SECRET CHURCHES, which thus far meets with much favor, promises to be a truly national gathering, the missionary societies will wish to be represented, and some one will make a tour through the South and secure a full representation of the colored people.

HON. RICHARD RUSH.

Take him for all in all,
We shall not look upon his like again.
—Shakespeare.

An old paper has been handed us, the Hartford, Conn., Intelligencer of 1829. Daniel Webster, J. Q. Adams, Edward Everett, Seward, Stevens, and their peers were then Anti-masons, in print. So were the entire Andover faculty, and some thousands of orthodox elergymen with them. Yet this Hartford paper tells us that there was not a town in the State, where the Intelligencer was taken, "in which Masous had not endeavored to prevent its circulation." Post-riders refused to carry it to subscribers. A lodge-committee attempted to bribe a carrier not to take it. "A Masonic clergyman, on the Sabbath, just out of the desk, snatched the paper in the house of a subscriber and committed it to the fire. Postmasters, writing the editor on business, did not frank their letters. A multitude of abusive and insulting letters, were written to the editor, the postage not paid by the writers. Masouic postmasters retained the paper in their offices and wrote the editor that "it lay there dead," and charged him the postage, while refusing or neglecting to give the paper to subscribers. Burning the paper by Masons was a common occurrence; and one post-rider was stopped by Masonic ruffians and threatened with violence if he brought the paper there again. General Jackson, then President, with his Cabinet, Livingston, Barry, Eaton, Poinsett, etc., were members of Federal lodge No. 1, in the District of Columbia, and Livingston was "Grand High Priest."

During that time, while the lodge was red with murder, and rank with every act which defines a villain, presses claiming decency and respectability spoke of the opponents of the lodge as "fanatics," "persecutors," "officeseekers," and "madmen." And though by a confession of judgment, 1,500 lodges gave up their charters under charges of murder, perjury, blasphemy, and treason against God and government, the scattered lodgeites bated no jot of their impudent haughtiness and supercilious contempt for great and good men. The same spirit is in them still.

Philip C. Tucker, of Vergennes, Vt., was for a time almost the sole public adherent of the lodge in that vicinity. He was a small, red-faced, bloated lawyer. After discharging a volley of his rattling ribaldry in the Middlebury court-house, the Vermont jurist and Senator, Phelps, whose son now represents us at the English court, referred to Tucker thus:

"Your honor, I have no word of reply, to Mr. Tucker. He has given us neither law nor argument. He has come iuto court, and, like a bear, setting on his haunches, he has simply growled at the case which he neither understands nor explains." Yet this inferior, seventh-rate person is a high saint in Masonic books.

A REPRESENTATIVE ANTI-MASON

of that day. A sketch of his father, Benjamin Rush, has already been given to our readers, and his Centennial celebrated as the father and founder of the temperance cause. His two sons, Benjamin and Richard, have left names which will last while there is a Rush Medical College, or an American diplomacy. Of these two sons, Richard was by much the greatest man. Born in Philadelphia, Aug. 29th, 1780, he died there July 30th, 1859.

Few lives have been richer or more diversified. As our minister to England, he negotiated treaties which prevented war. While Attorney General, he compiled our national laws. In 1833 he published a volume entitled "Memoranda of a Residence at the Court of St. James;" and in 1845 added a second volume of "Memoranda, Official and Personal." In 1857, he published "Washington's Domestic Life;" and in 1860 there appeared a volume of Miscellanies. In 1828 he received 83 electoral votes for Vice President of the United States, on the ticket with J. Q. Adams. Appointed minister to France, he was first to acknowledge the French Republic of 1848. Eight years before (1840), the United States Democratic Review speaks thus of Mr. Rush; "If talent of the highest order, an edueation the most liberal, laborious study, a judgment matured by profound thought; if a long life of devotion to his country in connection with some of her most unfortunate civic services; if political wisdom drawn from the best and purest sources, and a political integrity never questioned; if the most marked evidence by his fellow-countrymen of their just appreciation of his merits,—if sueh grounds can create an undeniable title to a national name, it will be awarded to Mr. Rush." And if blood enobles, he was the son of one signer of the Declaration of Independence, and the grandson of another.

His first political speech on the attack of the British on our frigate Chesapeake (1807) ranked him high among American orators. Next year he defended Col. Duane against Gov. McKean, which greatly endeared him to the then Democratic party. In January, 1811, Gov. Snyder appointed him Attorney General of Pennsylvania, and in November of the same year, President Madison appointed him Comptroller of the Treasury. In June, 1812, war was declared with England, and on July 4th following, Mr. Rush was selected to deliver an oration, when the President, Cabinet, both houses of Congress, and all the French ministers were among his audience. February, 1814, he had his choice of two seats in the Cabinet. He chose that of Attorney General, and filled the post with great public approbation. In 1817 he was Secretary of State, pro tem, six months under Monroe. During this time he arranged with Great Britain to cut down the national forees on the lakes to one vessel for each nation. October 31st, 1817, Mr. Rush was appointed Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Great Britain, a post which he held seven years. Many difficult matters were settled by him. His reports fill six or eight folios, and may now be seen in the State Department.

Gen. Jackson executed Arbuthnot aud Ambrister, two British subjects, and war was averted only by the patriotism and address of Adams and Rush: and the celebrated "Monroe Doctrine," which has been the settled policy of the country ever since, was formulated and established by these two statesmen. After this Mr. Rush rendered important service in settling a dangerous and stormy dispute between Ohio and Michigan; and also in securing the legacy which founded the Smithsonian Institution in Washington.

Now unlock the lodges. March out the taterdemalian host of stripped and sworn and aproned dupes. Let the whole host of darkness confront this one American, whose maguificent record is partially given above! Let them all shout at once "Crank," "Fanatic!" and see how the army of frogs, swallowing grandiloquent titles to swell themselves to the size of men, see how they shrink and pale away before the indignant glance of this one honest man. See how their "Sovereign, Grand Commander Pike," followed by his Indiau regiments in gray, with the scalps of Uuion soldiers dangling at their necks, quails before the indignant loathing of an honest American patriot and then let the world of lookers-on say which is the crank!

We have presented Richard Rush as a man and a statesman. We shall now present him as an Anti-mason.

In 1831 Anti-masons held in Baltimore the first national nominating convention for President of the United States. His friends applied to Mr. Rush to be their candidate. He declined. He had written and published powerful letters against the lodge; and he would not weaken the great force of his letters by running for office on an Anti-masonie ticket. Mr. Wirt was nominated.

Mr. Rush gave the great force of his mind to the study of the lodge question as developed in the courts; in testimony before eommittees of legislatures; and in revelations by hundreds of seceders from the lodges, many of them the best men living, and their testimony all agreed; and Mr. Rush poured out the wealth of his mighty genius, as a lawyer, statesman, and diplomatist. It was the story of Hercules strangling the serpent turned to history. He wrote simply as a man and an Ameriean, against the lodge which "is," in the words of Seward, "hostile to every American principle."

His first letter was a reply to a committee of the people of his own county, asking his views of the lodge. It is dated May 4th, 1831. He objects to "secret soeieties":

1. "Because pursuing objects unknown to the public, through means not known to the public, they act under diminished responsibilities to the public * * * Freemasonry is such a society."

2. Again: "It is seen from these [Lockport] trials that the laws cannot be executed upon the authors of an audacious and bloody conspiracy, in one of the most populous parts of the Union * * * although the conspirators are known to more than one hundred persons belonging to the Masonie body."

3. Again: "The law is paralyzed by a hidden agent stronger than the combined force of its machinery and its ministers." "I challenge the Spanish Inquisition to exceed it."

4. Again: "The press on this occasion has fallen into stupidity or turpitude. * * No sophistry can gainsay this position. * * True, these are depraved Masons who have done the deed, and I do not mean to judge all other Masons by them; but Masonry, corporate, existent Masonry, is the root. The abandoned fiends of the order know the truth and conceal it on system. They are wicked through principle. They confound crime with virtue; murder, with Masonic merit. Like imps of Pandemonium, they rejoice and dance in their sin. The deeper their guilt the more they make themselves invulnerable."

5. Again: "The press is silent or scoffs! The institution even turns complainant. It positively grows belligerant. It will not be 'persecuted.' It will have no noise made, none of this flash and bluster. Those who are driving the conspirators into the toils and breaking up their dens to save the future from similar tragedies, are denounced, ridiculed! They are infected with Anti-masonic excitement," etc., etc.

Such is the tenor of the first of the series of letters by this great and noble American. Contrasted with the subtle, crawling outgivings of the lodge, they read like the sentence of a judge against convicted felons. And they are not obsolete. Their doctrine is as true aud uecessary to-day as the moment when uttered.

The time of our readers, and our owu, forbids in one article an analysis of the other five letters on Masonry. They should all be read and pondered by every young American. They were written: the first as above; (2), to the officers of a Massachusetts convention; (3), to citizens of Lancaster county, Pa.; (4), to Hon. John C. Spencer; (5), to a State committee of a convention at Harrisburg; and (6), to a Senatorial convention in Peunsylvania.

In all these letters Mr. Rush deals with the lodge on political, not on religious grounds. He quotes Dymond "On the Principles of Morality" who says: "There are some creditable editors who do harm in the world, to an extent, compared with which robbery and treason are as nothing;" and shows that their guilt is the crime of not doing; suppressing truth by silence. (See the religious press of to-day.) He spurns as insult the cry of Masons, "Punish the guilty but not the innocent;" when every adhering Mason upholds the lodge which screens "the guilty." He declares that the men convicted and then in jail for taking Morgau off were then in good standing in all the lodges; no one of them ever was turned out of any lodge; but Masons fed and feted them, and carpeted their jails. Yet the editorial eunuchs of the lodge cry, "Punish the guilty" whom the lodges conceal, while they uphold the lodges which conceal murder, and so are themselves guilty. "Nobody dreams of indicting innocent Masons for the murder of Morgan; but only of putting an end to the institution which made Masons murder him." "The very dog unchained" fixes liability on the owner for the injury he does in the streets. He insists that "Prohibitory statutes" should be enacted against the lodge in New York. He calls the editors who act as janizaries and eunuchs for the lodge, "Cautious sentinels, prompt aud valiant to fire on the foes of the lodge; but never too quick to hit the lodge." "When Masonry calls the name of Washington to its aid, it commits a profanation rivaling its crime of murder." "As surely as he tore in pieces the oath which once bound him to George III., so surely would he have torn up the oath which bound him to a lodge convicted of crime against the laws;" and, "There is, obviously, no mode of getting rid of it but by bringing public opinion to bear on it at our elections." A single Mason on a jury defeated an action brought by the people of New York. Masons have refused to testify in courts, preferring a jail to testifying to the truth against the lodge.

But enough, at least for this time. Our object has been to show which is the "crank," Hon. Richard Rush, or Confederate General Pike. To show that the lodge is a compound of mean and man-degrading vices; in all ages, one and the same; its morals, villainy; its religiou, blasphemy; and its god, Satan, the "god of this world who deceiveth the kings of the earth and the whole world." That good men are deceived by it is uo more justification of it than that good men are bitten by mad dogs justifies hydrophobia. It is of Satan's planting, and Christ's word is given that it "shall be rooted up." And if a general convention of anti-secret churches can unite good men against it, that will be one of the brightest days that ever dawned on the hopes of America and the world since the advent of Christ.

—Secretary Stoddard returned Saturday from a very profitable and encouraging trip of two weeks which has been reported. He expects this week to speak in Pecatonica and Rockford.

—Bro. C. F. Hawley, Iowa agent, is preparing for a county meeting at West Union, Fayette county, October 19th, and writes to engage the services of Secretary Stoddard for that date.

—The Iconoclast of Brantford, Ontario, whose editor, Rev. T. P. Wilkinson, has dealt the lodge some heavy blows, has removed to Toronto and takes a new name—The Golden Rule. The editor's address is Parkdale, Out.

—A few days ago an aged widow in Ohio sent $5, to help on the blessed and urgent work for which Bro. Woodsmall pleads on the second page of this number. How many of our wealthy friends ean add as much or more to this fund for sending the paper to Southern ministers?

—Our untiring friend, George W. Clark, who will never allow us to call him "old," is still the bard of the reform. He has nearly ready for sale by the N. C. A. a choice selection of his reform songs, suited especially to our work, which will be supplied at so popular a rate that we hope every family will need two or three copies.

—Elder Callender's appeal for the Memphis brethren will not, we are sure, be unheeded. Read it and lay it before the Lord. A sister also, who wishes to aid Bro. Zaraphonithes in Greece in the same way—securing a home,—starts a subscripiion of $1.00. Will not other friends add to this sum? Send for both objects, with plain designation, to Bro. Phillips, Treasurer N. C. A.

—Bro. R. Loggan of the Kansas Association is attending the annual United Brethren conference at Clifton. Next week he hopes to begin a solid winter's work for the reform, traveling with his own conveyance much of the time and taking in the country settlements. Let the Kansas friends welcome Bro. Loggan wherever he appears, and send for him when he delays long a visit.

—Rev. George Warrington, president of the Iowa State Association, is the American candidate for County Superintendent of Schools for Van Buren county. The party has a full county ticket headed by S. Boon for representative to the State Legislature. The partisan press is greatly exercised at the union of Anti-masons and Prohibitionists in supporting the State ticket. The conditions are favorable for a good vote for the Mickelwaite ticket.

—Bro. W. B. Stoddard goes to his new field in Ohio on Thursday of this week. His canvass of Chicago has enriched his experience and quickened his zeal against the lodge. Ohio friends must put their shoulders to the wheel with him. He does not propose to aim at nothing and hit it. Read his address in another column, and let there be no wavering in the lines. Our Great Master expects every man to do his duty when the battle is set in array. There must be some self-denial in order to accomplish anything in an unpopular reform. Such work only proves our faith.

—The article in this number explaining the formation and character of a new temperance society among Scandinavians is by the editor of Tidens Fragor, (Questions of the Times). The principle of secrecy which curses other movements in this direction is very sensibly rejected, but will not the degrees, titles and formality open the way for the lodge with its obligations? This society was formed evidently with a sincere purpose to promote temperance. This should be encouraged and if there has been some mistake in the methods employed let it be kindly shown. Will not some one of our Swedish brethren undertake this labor in Christ's name?

—The report of the Trustees of the Peabody educational fund, Oct. 7th, shows that rapid advancement has been made during the past year in educational methods in the Southern States. Public sentiment had revolutionized the public school system. The freedmen are now enjoying many school privileges hitherto denied them. The following sums from the Peabody educational fund have been paid out during the past year in the Southern States: Alabama, $5,300; Arkansas, $3,100; Florida, $2,375; Georgia, $4,175; Louisiana, $1,800; Mississippi, $2,250; North Carolina, $5,430; South Carolina, $5,000; Tennessee, $11,850; Texas, $7,150; Virginia, $6,775; West Virginia, $2,500. Total, $57,705.

The same number of the Boston Evening Record which reported the arrest, trial, and condemntaion of seven persons who were fined teu dollars each for preaching the Gospel on Boston Common, contained on another page a map of the very precinct where the preaching occurred, showing the precise location of about a dozen gambling dens, which were being run contrary to law, week days, and probably Sundays; none of which were interfered with by the police. Not that the police were partial to gambling or opposed to preaching, but they were obliged to obey orders, and they were ordered to make complaints against the preachers, and were not ordered to meddle with the other violaters of the law. Besides, it is useless to arrest criminals when the authorities will not prosecute them if complained of.—Common People.

AN APPEAL FOR REV. R. N. COUNTEE.

Memphis, Tenn., Sept. 17, 1885.

Elder N. Callender,

Dear Bro:—Having learned of you through Elder J. H. Austin, of Goshen, and of your great suffering for the cause of Christ, I write you, believing you would sympathize with me in this my day of trial. You have no doubt learned of my suffering (an account of which was published in nearly all the papers, but fully in the Christian Cynosure of Chicago), because of my oppositou to secretism. I have been a member and an active worker in the Masonics, Odd-fellows, Pythians, and other kindred orders nearly one-half of my life, and now because God has inspired my heart to oppose their wickedness and denounce them, I have been assailed, my house mobbed and fired into at the dead hour of night by a band of disguised secretists; who, conscious of the presence of my wife and children, and regardless of their screams and that of my aged mother, inhumanly fired shot after shot into the house. But blessed be God, we all escaped. But you know how they are; they are yet breathing out vengeance against me. I live one mile from the city proper, and have no protection save my brethren who come out every night and stay with us, walking as sentinels all night long. Winter will soon be upon us, and they will not be able to walk so far and attend to their daily work, hence they are anxious to get me near them and make the enclosed appeal, kindly furnished us by Bro. Austin. If you will please lay this before your church, or before such person or persons as you think can or will help us, we will be very grateful to you, and anything you may succeed in obtaining for us will be prayerfully acknowledged. May God sustain you, my brother, as you in like manner go forward to assist in hurling from his seat this power of Belial, and establishing by God's grace the name and power of the Lord Jesus Christ. Your brother in Christ,

R. N. Countee.

Thompson, Pa., Oct. 7, 1885.

Dear Cynosure:—Few events of greater moment, if any, have occurred since our "holy war" upon the "image of the beast" commenced, some eighteeu years ago, than the brave and noble stand taken by Bro. Countee of Memphis, Tenn. That his position against the secret empire is of vast importance, the enemy well understands. That the "old red dragon" is touched in a vital part is demonstrated by his agonized writhings. When one who has been foremost and prominent in so many lodges, one who has devoted "half his life" to those slavish clans, and has been a proficient in them, boldly cuts loose from them, and, as all honest men will do, warus God's people and the world at large against them, we may expect "the heathen to rage and the people to imagine vain things;"

Brother Countee has set a good example for the thousands of our ministers, both colored and white, who have been unwisely drawn into the slimy folds of that old serpent, the father of lodgery. Happy the man, though it cost him his all, with life itself, who breaks fellowship with demons.

Do we, does any one, need further proof of the murderous spirit of the lodge? That Bro. Countee may be counted with the tens of thousands who have been "counted worthy" to die a martyr for Christ and truth, is quite possible even though we do all in our power to protect him. But however this may be, let the loyal hosts of God's people rally to his defence. It is a rare opportunity God has put before us to help shield such a spirit from the vengeance of a sworn foe. Let God's dear people all over the land, of all classes, seize the opportunity aud place the hero of Memphis in the safest spot in the city; where, shielded and encouraged by gushing sympathy and strong arms, he will feel as secure as a man of moral convictions and positive character cau be made to feel, in a Christ-hating world like this. Our brother needs more than sympathy unalloyed. Let our sympathy be well mixed with the material aid that will culminate iu a home in the midst of his brave people. Suiting our course to this sentiment we will see what may be done.

We have not forgotten the days when it cost to be a sterling Mason, i. e., Anti-mason. Speculative Anti-masons we have, but they are too much like speculative Masons—shams. Let us have more operative Anti-masons. Apprehensive as we were of personal violence, (and not without reason) no "Masonic vengeance" was actually executed on me, save only to attempt the execution of my reputation on the altar of public sentiment by the Masonic "setting maul" of falsehood and slander. This for a time robbed me of a comfortable support and the good will of the superficial. Truly yours,

Nathan Callender.

The Home.

THE FULLNESS OF CHRIST.

For Christ and his abasement
And varied pains, I see
Enough for me while living,
At death, enough for me;
For through his cross I triumph,
I glory in his shame,
And find surpassing riches
In his beloved name.

Those held in sin's dark bondage
He came to set at large,
And with his blood he purchased
Their just and free discharge;
There is no condemnation
To all the blood-freed throng;
The blood's redeeming virtue
Will be their endless song.

He pardons sins, though counting
Like drops of morning dew;
His love no mind can measure—
Its life is ever new.
He craves for room to pity,
And mercy to impart—
For boundless stores of mercy
Are treasured in his heart.

In praises after praises
Eternity I'll spend,
If I, a fainting pilgrim,
Shall see my journey's end;
All storms gone by forever,
My sins all washed away,
Of spotless white my garments,
My light the perfect day.

SABBATH BREAKING IN GOD'S HOUSE.

That Christianity is a divinely inspired system of faith and a rule of daily life, all orthodox people admit: but do we make enough of it on the side of devotion? Amid all the excellent admonitions to work, are we not in danger of belittling the duty of worship? The Sabbath was appointed not merely for physical rest and refreshment, but for the worship of God: sanctuaries are built not only as places of religious instructions, but for services of hom age and praise to Jehovah of Hosts. The primary purpose of the Lord's Day is to lead men to the Lord.

(1) Suppose that we could ascertain the real motives which bring many people to church on the Sabbath. We would discover that some come to church with no thought of meeting God, but only of meeting their minister or some attractive preacher. The uppermost thought in their minds is not "is God in this place?" but who will be in the pulpit to-day? They have come to hear Mr. A—— or Dr. B———, to enjoy his sermon, and perhaps they have an honest desire to be profited by his instructions. But their thoughts do not rise one inch above the pulpit. The preliminary service of prayer and praise and reading of God's word is merely a "first course," an appetiser for the substantial feast of the sermon. It would not be regarded as a serious loss if all acts and utterances of pure devotion were dispensed with, and if the discourse occupied the whole time, as the lecture does in a popular lyceum hall. Far be it from us to disparage the province or the power of a faithful pulpit in unfolding God's word, and in the whole range of its work in awakening, guiding, comforting, and edifying the immortal souls assembled before it. But no possible profit from the best of preachers, even though he combined the powers of a Chalmers and a Spurgeon, can make up for the absence of deep and devout heart worship. An eloquent tongue may thrill an auditor with sublime thoughts about God, and yet that auditor have not one outgoing of heart towards God. If there be any worship at all, it is the intellectual homage to the minister, and not a particle of worship of him who is a Spirit, and in spirit and in truth. Some of the most enthusiastic admirers of good preaching are men and women who seldom think again about religion until the next "splendid sermon" comes. We are afraid that thousands of church members would seldom enter the sanctuary if there were to be either very inferior preaching or no preaching at all.

(2) If this first class are drawn to church for the intellectual or moral profit of the sermon, there is ano her class who go for mere entertainment. "How did you like it?" is the first question which one of this self-indulgent class might ask of another. They enjoy the musical performances, provided that they are artistic and stimulating; but they would enjoy Parepa or Patti or some "prima donna" vastly more. They enjoy the sermon also if it is piquant and smart or gracefully delivered. A leisure hour of a long day is pleasantly whiled away in good company, and a certain credit of respectability has been gotten very cheaply. When the performance is over, such persons can tell you how the organ voluntary could be improved, or the soprano's execution, or the minister's gestures, or the dress of the next neighbors; but what improvement has been made in their own hearts or in their character before an all-searching God? Has God indeed been in their thoughts for a single moment? They have been so occupied in self-worship (for that is the real motive which brings them there at all) that they have utterly ignored him whom the heaven of heavens delights to adore.

(3) Here are two classes of sinners against the primal idea of worship. There is a third class whose sin is that they bring their farms and their flour mills, their stock-lists and their ledgers, their housekeeping and their next week's party all into the house of God with them. What is the difference between them and the sacrilegious hucksters whom our Lord scourged out of the Temple with their bird-stalls and their money-tables? These worldlings are selling stocks or planning business investments or deciding about the guests and the invitations for the coming entertainment, all the time that they are pretending to be worshipers of him who reads their innermost thoughts. "You are the first minister who has ever preached me out of my flour store," said a very frank merchant once to his pastor. We honored his candor; but it raised the question, How many human bodies may there be before this pulpit from which the soul is away off in broker's offices and warehouses and political caucuses or in some other form of mammon worship? All these persons may collect their wandering thoughts enough to join in a very solemn closing hymn, and then they will go home without the least compunction for having been Sabbath-breakers in the very temple set apart for Jehovah's praise.

We would not employ harsh or censorious language; but do not all these classes of church-goers actually profane the Sabbath by utterly ignoring the primal idea for which the Sabbath was instituted and the sanctuary reared? It is not the question between more singing and less sermon, or between liturgical responses and the silence of the congregation during the services, that we are now raising. It is the far more vital one whether God's day is not really violated inside of God's house by all who go there, for either minister-worship, or self-worship, or mammon-worship, and offer no shred of heart-worship to their Creator. So much is said, and properly said, about the increasing external violations of the Lord's day, that there is danger of ignoring the internal violation by refusing to worship the Lord of the day entirely. In God's sight, where is the difference between the man whose body is wandering in the fields or on the sea shore, and the other man whose heart is wandering while his body is in a church pew? We raise all these questions simply to set people to thinking, and some people, too, who imagine that they are fulfilling their duty by going to God's house, and yet never go to God at all. Like every other sin, this sin is a sad robbery of their own souls. To lose the Sabbath is a terrible loss; and every Sabbath is lost that does not bring our poor, needy, sinful soul right up to our heavenly Father and to our only Saviour. Godless Sabbaths may lead to a Godless eternity.—Dr. T. L. Cuyler.

"A BURDEN."

An unknown correspondent says: "Don't make the Sabbath and Sabbath-school such a time and place of discipline, rules, regulations, etc., as to defeat the object for which the Sabbath was made—rest. Freedom is dear to all, old and young, and it is fatal to induce the child to dread the Sabbath and its duties. You are doing nobly, grandly. Beware of extremes."

There is wisdom in this suggestion. The Sabbath must not be a day of excessive labor; and it must be a day of rest.

The Sabbath-school is the place of worship; it is also a place for Bible study. It is not a sociable; it is not a place for lounging; it is a provision for restful work in intellectual and spiritual lines; in the intellectual because of an inner spiritual. That there may be profitable study there must be good order. There is less wear and tear of the nervous system in one hour of well-disciplined order and restraint than in one hour of freedom and confusion.

Rest is change of occupation rather than suspension of activity. A true student rests by reading lighter or different literature from that upon which he has been concentrating his attention closely. A laboring man rests by thinking and reading. The service of song and prayer and class study, which we call the Sabbath-school should be rest to all who participate in it, even when its order is strict, its worship thoughtful, and its intellectual exertions intense.

We should not make the Sabbath a dread to our young people, but, by kindling in them spiritual tastes, and impressing upon them the importance of spiritual truth, make them eager to know about the "things of the kingdom." They study five days in the week in secular schools, and learn nothing about God; they need on the Sabbath day to bring the same mental forces which are employed during the week, and consecrate them to the study of the divine character, law and government.

That Sabbath-school which has the best order, the closest programme, the sharpest drills, the most concentrated intellectual attention, the most fervent spiritual exercise, is the Sabbath-school which is most restful to its members.

The Sabbath day that is filled from early morning until dewy eve with home devotion and conversation, public worship and Bible study, is the Sabbath from which people go forth rested and invigorated, and prepared for the activities of the following week.—S. S. Journal.

GLAD AUTUMN DAYS.

The magic voice of spring has gone,
Her emerald blades are turning brown;
The dandelion's ball of lace
Has given place to thistle-down;
The violets have caught the dew,
And hid it 'neath their bonnets blue,
And orchard blossoms, pure and sweet,
Have long since withered in the heat.

The sickle, sharp and keen, has reaped
The meadow blossoms, rows on rows,
The barley lies in winnowed heaps,
And aftermath luxuriant grows;
The sumac tall, all touched with change,
Forms crimson head around the grange,
And, floating now my path across,
On gauzy wings is milkweed's floss.

O, maples all in scarlet dressed;
O, spikes of fiery golden rod;
O, purple asters everywhere
Upspringing form the sere-grown sod;
O, blue-fringed gentian, growing tall,
Thou comest when the leaflets fall,
Sweet flowers to bloom 'neath golden haze,
And glorify glad autumn days.

SOMETHING FOR BOYS.

Two men stood at the same table in a large factory in Philadelphia, working at the same trade. Having an hour for their nooning every day, each undertook to use it in accomplishing a definite purpose; each persevered for about the same number of months, and each won success at last. One of these two mechanics used his daily leisure hour in working out the invention of a machine for sawing a block of wood into almost any desired shape. When his invention was completed, he sold the patent for a fortune, changed his workman's apron for a broadcloth suit, and moved out of a tenement house into a brown stone mansion. The other man—what did he do? Well, he spent an hour each day during most of the year in the very difficult undertaking of teaching a little dog to stand on its hind feet and dance a jig, while he played a tune. At last accounts he was working ten hours a day at the same trade and at his old wages, and finding fault with the fate that made his fellow-workman rich while leaving him poor. Leisure minutes may bring golden grain to mind as well as purse, if one harvests wheat instead of chaff.—Wide Awake.

THE GIRL THAT EVERYBODY LIKES.

She is not beautiful—O, no! Nobody thinks of calling her that. Not one of a dozen can tell whether her eyes are black or blue. If you should ask them to describe her they would only say, "She is just right," and there it would end. She is a merry-hearted, fun-loving, bewitching maiden, without a spark of envy or malice in her whole composition. She enjoys herself and wants everybody else to do the same. She has always a kind word and a pleasant smile for the oldest man or woman; in fact I can think of nothing she resembles more than a sunbeam, which brightens everything it comes in contact with. All pay her marked attention, from rich Mr. Watts who lives in a mansion on the hill to Sam, the sweep. All look after her with an admiring eye, and say to themselves: "She is just the right sort of a girl!" The young men of the town vie with one another as to who can show her most attention; but she never encourages them beyond being simply kind and jolly; so no one can call her a flirt; no indeed, the young men all deny such an assertion as quickly as she. Girls—wonderful to relate—like her, too, for she never delights in hurting their feelings, or saying spiteful things behind their backs. She is always willing to join in their little plans and assist them in any way. They go to her with their love affairs, and she manages adroitly to see Willie or Peter, and drop a good word for Ida or Jennie, until their little difficulties are all patched up, and everything goes smoothly again—thanks to her. Old ladies say she is "delightful." The sly witch—she knows how to manage them. She listens patiently to complaints of rheumatism or neuralgia, and then sympathizes with them so heartily that they are more than half cured. But she cannot always remain with us. A young man comes from a neighboring town, after a time, and marries her. The villagers crowd around to tell him what a prize he has won, but he seems to know it pretty well without any telling, to judge from his face. So she leaves us, and it is not long before we hear from that place. She is there the woman that everybody likes.—Christian Advocate.

THE FALL OF A MOUNTAIN.

Some seventy years ago an old man sat at the door of his cottage in the Swiss village of Goldau enjoying the warmth of the summer sunshine, and the view of the fresh green valley dappled here and there with clumps of trees. All around the great purple mountains stood up against the sky, as if keeping guard over the pretty little village in their midst, with its tiny log huts clustered beneath the shadow of the neat white church, like chickens nestling under the wing of the mother.

A big, florid, jolly-looking man came striding up the path, and held out his hand to the old peasant, with a hearty "Good-day, Neighbor Kraus."

"Good-day, Neighbor Schwartz. Fine weather to-day."

"Beautiful. We'll have a famous harvest this year, please God."

"I hope so, neighbor. Won't you sit down a minute? It's warm walking."

"Thanks, I will. Holloa! what's the matter over yonder?"

Right opposite them, five thousand feet overhead, towered the dark mass of the Rossberg, the highest of the surrounding mountains. Just as Schwartz spoke, its huge outline seemed to be agitated by a slight tremulous motion, like the nodding of a plume of feathers.

"Well, my friend, what are you staring at? Did you never see the trees shaking in the wind before?"

"Of course; but it seemed to me somehow as if it wasn't only the trees that shook, but the whole mountain."

"You're easily scared," chuckled the old man. "I suppose you're thinking of the old saying that the Rossberg is to fall some day. Bah! they've been saying so ever since I was a child, and it hasn't fallen yet."

Schwartz laughed, and the two friends went on talking. But suddenly the visitor started up with a look of unmistakable terror; and no wonder. His spiked staff which he had stuck carelessly into the ground beside him when he sat down, was moving to and fro itself."

"Good gracious! do you see that, Father Kraus? And look at those birds yonder, flying screaming away from the trees on the Rossberg! Something wrong, say what you will."

At that moment Hans Godrel, the miller, came flying past, shouting: "Run for your lives! The stream's dried up, and that always comes before an earthquake or an avalanche. Run!"

"Pooh! I'll have time to fill my pipe again," said old Kraus, coolly producing his tobacco pouch.

But Schwartz was too thoroughly frightened to wait another moment. Down the hill he flew like a madman, and had barely got clear of the village when the earth shook under his feet so violently as to throw him down. He sprang up again just in time to see poor old Kraus's cottage vanish in a whirl of dust like a bursting bubble.

The next moment there came a terrific crash, followed by another so much louder that it seemed to shake the very sky. In a moment all was dark as night, and amid the gloom could be heard a medley of fearful sounds—the rending of strong timbers, the hollow rumble of falling rocks and gravel, the crash of wrecked buildings, the shriek of the doomed inmates, and the roar of the angry waves from the lake below, as if all its waters were breaking loose at once.

The last house of the village, on the side farthest from the Rossberg, was that of Antoine Sepel, the wood-cutter, who at the first alarm snatched up two of his children, and made for the opposite hill-side, calling to his wife to follow with the other two. But the youngest, Marianne, a little girl of six had just run into the house, and before her mother could reach her, the first crash came. The terrified woman seized the other girl, and fled without looking behind her.

But the old servant, Francoise, could think of her little favorite under the shadow of coming destruction. She darted into the house, and had just caught the child in her arms, when the tremendous din of the final crash told her that it was too late. In an instant the house was lifted bodily from its place, and spun round like a top. The child was torn from her clasp, and she felt herself thrown violently forward, the strong timbers falling to pieces around her like a pack of cards. Still, however, the brave women struggled to free herself, but the weight that kept her down defied her utmost strength. For her own safety she cared but little, although a violent pain in her head and a numbness along her left arm told her that she was severely hurt. But where was the child?

"Marianne!" she cried in desperation.

"Here I am," answered a tiny voice, seemingly not far from her. "I'm not hurt a bit, only there's something holding me down; and I can see light overhead quite plain. Won't they come and take us soon?"

"No, there's no hope of that," said the old woman feebly; "this is the day of doom for us all. Say your prayers, darling, and commend yourself to God."

And upward through the universal ruin, amid shattered rocks and uprooted mountains, stole the child's clear sweet voice, praying the prayer that she had learned at her mother's knee. It rose from that grim chaos of destruction like Jonah's prayer from the depths of the sea, and like it was heard and answered.

How long the two prisoners remained pent up in that living grave they could never have told; but all at once Marianne thought she heard a voice calling her name, and she held her breath to listen. Yes, she was not mistaken; there was a voice calling to her, and it was the voice of her father.

Sepel, having seen his wife and the other three children placed in safety far up the opposite hillside, had hurried back to seek the missing girl. But it was in vain that he looked for any trace of the village or even the valley itself. The green, sunny uplands, where the laborers had been working and the children frolicking but a few hours ago, were now one hideous disorder of fallen rocks, bare gravel and black cindery dust, amid which he wandered at random, calling desperately upon his lost darling.

But the answer came at last: a clear, musical call, which rose from a shapeless heap of ruin that even he had failed to recognize as his pretty little cottage. Hurrying to the spot, he began to tear away the rubbish with the strength of a giant, and speedily drew forth the child unhurt, the falling timbers, as if by miracle, having formed a kind of arch over her, completely protecting her from injury.

Brave old Francoise had been less fortunate. Her left arm was so badly hurt that she never recovered the use of it, and to the end of her life she was timid and nervous from the effects of that terrible night. But, compared with the rest of the ill-fated villagers she might well esteem herself fortunate. Four-fifths of them were killed on the spot, many more crippled for life, and those who escaped found themselves reduced to absolute beggary. Of Goldau itself nothing remained but the bell of its steeple, which was found more than a mile away. The lower end of Lake Lowertz, farther down the valley, was completely choked up by the falling rocks; and the water thus dislodged, rushed in a mighty wave seventy feet high over the island in the center, sweeping away every living thing upon it. The once happy and beautiful valley is still a frightful desert, and here and there among the surrounding hills, you may find some white-haired grandfather who himself witnessed the calamity, and will tell you, in his quaint mountain speech, how Rossberg fell upon Goldau.—Harper's Young People.

Kind Deeds.—The Berlin City Missions employ thirty agents, who spend most of their time in visiting the neglected or negligent poor. They distribute every Sunday 70,000 to 80,000 sermons among those who are prevented from going to church regularly, and an equal number of church papers find their way to the poorer quarters during the week. An asylum for discharged convicts is in course of erection.

"Hell Gate Brewery" is the suggestive name printed in huge letters on the side of one of the largest beer manufactories in New York City. Signs sometimes tell a great truth.

TEMPERANCE.

DRINKING IN ENGLAND.

The London correspondent of The Nation, writing upon "Manners and Morals in England," under date of October 20, thus refers to the drinking customs in our mother country:—

"To come to a more serious matter, there can be no doubt that intoxication is far less common among the middle and upper classes than it was in our grandfathers' or fathers' times. One sees this in many ways. Thirty years ago people sat over their wine after dinner for an hour at least, and drank five or six glasses of port. Now they sit, unless some interesting subject of talk turns up, only twenty minutes, and drink two or three glasses at most. It is true that more is drunk at dinner, but it is less trying to the head then. The number of those who drink nothing is large and increases daily, partly because many physicians prescribe abstinence, partly from philanthropic motives and the desire to set a good example to the poor. On the stage, in comic papers, in after-dinner speeches, it is still a conventional joke to assume that people get drunk in good society; but in reality the phenomenon is rare. A few weeks ago I heard a man of fifty, who had moved a good deal in the best circles of London and of a university city, declare that he had never but twice in his life seen a gentleman the worse for liquor; and several persons among the party present declared their experience to be similar. Others could not say quite so much, but all agreed that, considering how common intoxication is among certain classes, and used to be among all classes, it had become surprisingly rare in their own rank. This does not mean that there are not still many people who injure their health and character by the too-frequent resort to stimulants, for one hears many lamentations over the practice of taking 'nips' and 'pick-me-ups' through the day,—a practice alleged to prevail among ladies of fashion as well as young men in the city. I speak only of intoxication, which has become a mark of gross ill-breeding in the society of ladies, and is condemned as 'bad form' even in a party of men."

SUMPTUARY LAWS.

The Delaware Prohibitionist says: "Sumptuary laws, according to Webster, are 'such as restrain or limit the expenses of citizen's in apparel, food furniture, or the like.' How much propriety there is in calling prohibition statutes sumptuary laws appears by a mere glance at the above definition. Their only object is to remove from the path of the citizen temptations to spend his money for that which is not bread, but which endangers health, life, happiness and morals. Their aim is not to 'limit the expenses of citizens in apparel, food, furniture,' or any similar thing, but to aid them in procuring more and better of all these things. Prohibitory laws are no more sumptuary than license laws or quarantine regulations, or the statutes prohibiting the use of the mails for immoral literature. They are police laws, not sumptuary laws."

Tobacco and the Pulse.—Dr. Troftski publishes the results of a number of observations made by him to ascertain the effects produced on the temperature and pulse by smoking. He has found that in every case, varying according to the condition of the individual, there is an exhilaration of the pulse-rate and a slight elevating of the temperature. It appears, in fact, that if the average temperature of non-smokers were represeuted by one thousand, that of moderate smokers would be one thousand and eight; and while the heart in the former case was making one thousand pulsations, in the latter it would beat one thousand one hundred and eighty times. Heuce the danger of tobacco smoking.

"Serpent of the still" indeed, when coiled iu the delicate wine-glass at the rich man's table! A serpent that stings like an adder, not only the proud father, but waits to sting more deeply still the fair boy with eyes opening to see good and evil, who "looks on the wine when it is red" in his own father's hand. How much more cruel than he, who, if his child ask for bread, shall give him a stone, is he who, in answer to his boy's demands, feeds him with poison that shall destroy both body and soul.

—At the Indiana Yearly Meeting of Friends, Sarah F. Willis gave an interesting account of her travels around the world in the interest of the cause, and branded the Russians as the most intemperate Christians. Quarterly meeting reports showed 65 Friends indulging in alcoholic liquors, 11 raising tobacco, 31 selling it, and 694 using it, thus expending $5,915 annually.

—The Missionary Herald reports as follows in regard to China: "The table given among the 'Notes from the Wide Field' presents at a glance the condition of Protestant missionary work in China. The facts brought to light are unexpectedly encouraging. The communicants in the churches exceed 26,000, a number quite in advance of the estimate commonly made, and more than double the number reported eight years ago, at the Shanghai Conference of 1877. At the Mildmay Conference, held in London in 1878, Dr. Legge affirmed, in reporting 13,000 communicants, that it was fair to estimate four adherents for each one of these church members. On this basis, against the 50,000 souls who were then assumed as belonging to professedly Christian communities, we may now think of over 100,000 Chinese as standing in this relation. This is remarkable progress for any land, and is especially remarkable of China, where the people move so slowly. The increase in native assistants is also most hopeful, there being now 1,450 such Christian helpers in place of the 1,040 reported eight years ago. We may well thank God and take courage."

—The Earl of Shaftsbury, the distinguished Christian philanthropist, President of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and of the Ragged School Union since its organization in 1844, and of the Victoria Institute, and a member and officer of many charitable institutions, died on Sept. 24th, in his eighty-fifth year. He was the seventh Earl of Shaftsbury, was educated at Oxford, where he graduated with honor, was elected to the House of Commons in 1826, became a member of the Cabinet in Sir Robert Peel's first administration in 1834, but declined an appoiutment duriug Peel's secoud Premiership. He was distiuguished for many years for his decided evaugelical Christian faith, his devotion to the interests of the Christian church, his catholic sympathies, his constant endeavors to improve the condition of what are called the lower classes. The Costermongers elected him a member of their fraternity, and laboring men esteemed him as one of their most earnest, sincere and courageous friends. As a member of the House of Lords his efforts were directed almost exclusively to the adoption of measures designed to relieve and improve the condition of the humbler classes of society.

FREE METHODIST TESTIMONY.

OHIO CONFERENCE ON SECRET SOCIETIES

Your committee on secret societies wish to report as follows:

Inasmuch as we believe that organized secrecy, in all its branches, stauds opposed to true Christiauity, and is condemned by God's Word; that its teachiugs are erroneous and false, and that it works treason against God and man; and inasmuch as it has already gained possession of the reins of church government in many instances, and is growing within nearly all ecclesiastical bodies; therefore,

Resolved, That we will set ourselves individually, and as a church, more zealously in array against it, opposing it in every lawful way. Further, that we will use all the means in our power to enlighten the people in regard to the evil of secrecy, especially Freemasonry.

WEST KANSAS CONFERENCE ON SECRET SOCIETIES.

We quote our book of discipline: "Voluntary associatious are not necessarily sinful because they are secret, but secrecy is always a ground of suspicion. Evil works instinctivcly incline to darkuess. Good works grow up in light. God commands us to let our light shine. Even a good cause under the shadow of secrecy invalidates its claim to the confidence of open and honest men. Grace and guile can have no affinity. All secrets, necessary to be kept, can be kept without an oath. A bad institution ought not and a good one need not be secret." One of the dangerous characteristics of secret societies is the unwillingness of members to have their claims examined and discussed. This alone should keep those who desire a clear conscience before God from entering their door. Another is the prevarication, subterfuge, and falsehood resorted to by adherents to keep those outside ignorant of their character. This is true to an extent that indicates that demoralization and debauchery of conscience are incident to such association. The war against secret societies is by no means ended. The enemy has neither surrendered nor lost the virus of his disposition. Christian men should be on the alert, and girded for conflict. The life and strength of secretism is in Freemasonry. This defeated, most other orders would naturally succumb. We indict Freemasonry as un-American and anti-Christian. Its government, its titles, its style, are all undemocratic, calculated to foster the aristocracy of a class, and the subjection and enslavement of the multitude. The assumption of Freemasonry to antiquity, morality and benevolence are egotistic, absurd, aud hypocritical. Its principles are corrupt, its oaths un-Scriptural and demoralizing, its penalties blood-curdling. The light of day is shining in upon its darkness. If men will read they may understand. We advise our people to be of one mind in withstanding, exposing and removing this enemy of the kingdom of Christ.

Both men were high members of the Chinese Masonic order, and the murder took place in a session of the lodge. THAT YOU CAN SEND IN A CLUB OF SIX or more trial subscribers at twenty-five cents each? We continue the offer of eight numbers of the Christian Cynosure to any address for 25 cents.

This Washboard is made of one solid sheet of heavy corrugated zinc, which produces a double-faced board of the best quality and durability. The fluting is very deep, holding more water, and consequently doing better washing than any washboard in the market. The frame is made of hard wood and held together with an iron bolt running through a tube formed on the lower edge of the zinc, thus binding the whole together in the most substantial manner, and producing a washboard which for economy, excellence and durability, is unquestionably the best in the world. We find so many dealers that object to our board on account of its DURABILITY, saying, "It will last too long. We can never sell a customer but one." We take this means to advise customers to INSIST upon having the NORTH STAR WASHBOARD.

And take no other. If he does not keep it, it is because of its durability. Price, Family Size, 50 cents; Laundry size, 75 cents.

The best is the cheapest.

We will forward board on receipt of price.

HOME AND HEALTH.

HOPE AS A REMEDIAL MEASURE.

It is perfectly useless for us to attempt to portray the influence that "hope" exerts upon mankind. It is a proverbial fact that a man without hope in the fight for life is already half whipped. The sick man without hope is desperately ill indeed, however slight his physical ailment may be. It is equally as true that there is a very slight chance for the undertaker to be benefited in the case of a patient who has no disposition or idea of dying. The whole system, digestive, circulatory, and nervous, is directly under the influence of the mind; and if we will ever bear this in mind in treating our cases, we will often have a more potent remedy, easy of administration and more pleasant to give and take than anything found in the country doctor's saddle-bags or upon the shelves of our metropolitan pharmacists. Bad news, grief or sudden disappointment has been known to reduce the circulation to a minimum, to cause a strong man to become as helpless as a child and to arrest the process of digestion and assimilation as suddenly as if the patient's throat had been cut. Just the reverse of this may be observed under the influence of pleasant emotions, and the life giving power of bright, heaven-born hope.

My young friends, never enter a sick-room unless your countenance, manner, and words are such as to comfort and cheer your patients. However slight their hope may be, make use of that little, encourage and stimulate them to exercise that fortitude coupled with reasonable hope which has tided and will tide many a patient over dangerous shoals where medicine would have been utterly ineffective.—Southern Clinic.

SITTING IN ROOMS WITHOUT FIRE.

There is great danger to health at this season of the year from remaining any length of time in a room without fire, except in active exercise. The warning of discomfort is not felt as in cold weather, and yet the amount of sickness proves the necessity of carefulness. A word to the wise is sufficient.

BONE FELON.

The London Lancet tells how to cure a bone felon. As soon as it is felt put directly over the spot a fly blister the size of your thumb nail. Let it remain for six hours, at the expiration of which time directly under the surface of the blister may be seen the felon, which can instantly be taken out with the point of a needle. Unfortunately we can testify to the value of this remedy from experience. — Western Advocate.

RESPECT THE BODY.

A writer in the Hearth and Home has some sensible ideas on the subject of bodily health. He says: "Respect the body. Give it what it requires and no more. Don't pierce its ear or pinch its feet; don't roast it by a hot fire all day and smother it under heavy bed covering all night; don't put it in a cold draught on slight occasions, and don't nurse or pet it to death; don't dose it with doctors' stuffs. Respect the body; don't overwork, overrest, or over love it, and never debase it, but be able to lay down when you are done with it a well worn, but not mis-used thing. Meanwhile you will find it a most excellent thing to have—especially in the country."

SAND-BAG FOR THE SICK-ROOM.

One of the most convenient articles to be used in a sick room is a sand bag. Get some clean, fine sand, dry it thoroughly in a kettle on the stove; make a bag about eight inches square of flannel, fill it with dry sand, sew the opening carefully together, and cover the bag with cotton or linen cloth. This will prevent the sand from sifting out and will also enable you to heat the bag quickly by placing it in the oven, or even on top of the stove. After once using this you will never again attempt to warm the feet of a sick person with a bottle of hot water or a brick. The sand holds the heat a long time, and the bag can be tucked up to the back without hurting the invalid.—Health and Home.

There is considerable excitement in a town in Chenango county over a case of infanticide, the accused being a woman. Is she any more criminal than hundreds of her sisters who murder their unborn children? A leading physician of large practice says the public have no idea of the extent of this crime.—Freeman's Journal, Coopertown, N. Y.

FARM NOTES.

COAL ASHES.

Many persons make no use of coal ashes, but it certainly is an excellent mulch, "particularly for evergreens," so says an old gardener, and gardens where the soil baked badly have been brought into excellent condition by spading in coal ashes, after other things had been tried without success. Fertilizing qualities are not claimed for coal ashes, but it gives depth to the soil in a very inexpensive way. It makes it work easier, serves as a mulch, and insects are not fond of working in it.—Vick's Magazine.

HOW IT IS DONE.

In order to utilize in the garden the waste from the house at the least expense first purchase a barrel of unslacked lime, then take an empty barrel and begin by putting in it a layer of soil or ashes, and then the waste from the house, everything that cat or dog will not eat. Keep this decaying vegetable matter covered with an inch of soil or ashes, using coal or wood ashes. Once a week in winter, and oftener in summer, cover with lime, say half an inch. The lime will be slacking of course, and should be kept dry, but as lime retains its virtue a great while, the one barrel will last a year or more, according to the waste kept.

If starting this experiment in the autumn, early in the spring empty the contents of the barrel into the garden beds, cover with coal ashes, if the soil is not already deep enough and spade it in. Should the soil be deep and good, the compost can be used without the ashes, then when the weather is right, put it on the plants.—Vick's Magazine for October.

—As to poultry, the importance of exercise is an every day experience. Fat accumulates in all those breeds which are especially good as table fowls when they are allowed free access to feeding troughs or when corn is scattered upon the ground in excess of immediate consumption Games are a partial exception to this rule, and the only one. Leghorns, Spanish and Hamburgs, are naturally so active that if they have a chance to forage, they will neglect the feed thrown to them, for the love of foraging and the early worm. Games do the same thing, and if these breeds have only very contracted quarters they will make the most of their limited opportunities. Asiatics, Dorkings, the French breeds, Plymouth Rocks, and numerous general purpose fowls, and the Polish, or top-knotted breeds generally, will fatten up, stop laying, and become nearly or quite barren, besides being exposed to cholera and many other ills that fowls are liable to. Flocks of fowls among our neighbors have recently suffered greatly from cholera. In almost every case that has been closely investigated, it was found that they were freely fed several times a day, and either confined to small yards, or they were large fowls, disinclined to forage or wander about, except when hungry. The first symptom was abdominal fat, then it was noticed that they staid long upon the roost in the morning, and went early to roost at evening, and that egg-laying ceased; then cholera swept off nine-tenths of the flock It is a good rule never to feed fowls unless they will run when called to be fed, and to stop throwing out grain the moment any of them cease to run after it. In the summer time, once feeding daily is usually enough for fowls that have the run of the fields and pick up their living.—American Agriculturist.

The attendance at the last fat stock show exceeded 100,000, and there is every reason to expect a much larger attendance at the next.

The New York Daily Commercial Bulletin of Oct. 6, estimates the fire loss of the United States and Canada for September at $6,525,000, which is less by $3,700,000 than in September, 1884, and some $300,000 less than the average September fire waste of the past ten years.

The threatened strike of street-car employes at St. Louis was inaugurated Tuesday afternoon, three-fourths of the men taking part. But few cars are running, and being fair week, with thousands of visitors in town, the people are greatly inconveneinced. Thursday the riot broke out. A crowd of strikers gathered, who pulled a driver from his car, the man falling in such a way that he was run over by the wheels and dangerously hurt. The mob next unhitched the mules and shoved the car, with ten others, down the incline the collision smashing the vehicles to splinters. The police appearing on the scene, a fight followed, the officers using their batons with great effect. Seventeen of the rioters were arrested, and many others were badly wounded. The authorities, fearing a renewal of the conflict have sworn in special policemen. The strikers have assumed a menacing attitude. Friday the mob made demonstrations in several localities, threw street cars from the track and in some cases gave the occupants barely time to leave the cars. The skull of one conductor was broken by a blow, and a policeman shot and killed a rioter. Several fights between the people and police occurred in which serious wounds were inflicted. A call was made for 500 special officers. About twenty-five cars on different lines were overturned by the rioters and partially wrecked.

The Mail of this city, while other papers have room for nothing but Ohio politics, is deserving the praise of every decent citizen for its effort to cleanse the Augean stable of our county courts, beginning at the grand jury. That body is described as more fit for the penitentiary than the criminals upon whom it passes. Doggery owners, saloon vagrants and managers of "Dago dives," are so thick that saloonkeepers who violate the law are as safe in their hands as if they were forsworn Freemasons. A Citizen's Committee of Safety is now at work to secure a respectable board of County Commissioners, the purification of the grand jury being one result of their success. Honorable citizens must learn, moreover, that the same principle which excludes saloonists from the grand jury, so that the hot beds of crime be no longer sheltered, will equally well apply to Freemasons whose oaths are surely as binding as the good fellowship of a groggery.

Mrs. Judith Ellen Foster has succeeded in Iowa in her effort to divide the counsels of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Following up her effort in St. Louis last year in the National meeting of the Union, after an all-day's discussion the Iowa Union, meeting last week in Iowa City, voted against endorsing the prohibition movement in politics. We hope that is as far as her influence will go, and that the next National gathering, to be held in Philadelphia next week, will maintain the position so ably taken by the organization. The Illinois Union meeting in Jacksonville Oct. 6th to 9th, reaffirmed the action of the National Union by an almost unanimous vote. Miss Mary A. West, pro tem editor of the Union-Signal, was in the chair and was re-elected.

The city of Freeport, Illinois, has found the roller skating rinks the cause of so much trouble, that the Aldermen have unanimously voted a license of $500 in the hope of suppressing the only one existing in the city. This suggests a melancholy sight on Washington Boulevard, the fashionable street of the West Side in this city. The great stone church occupied up to three or four years ago by the Third Presbyterian church, one of the largest in the city, is now pulled down to make room for residence flats, while the rest of the block is filled up with a new roller rink of the largest dimensions and evidently a place of popular resort. The old church had the most stately steeple in Chicago, which has for many years been a landmark in that part of the city. Near by another fine stone church is also being rebuilt into residences, while farther toward the business center stands a deserted Universalist church; the old 1st Congregationalist church, whose seats are now in Wheaton College chapel, is now used as a tombstone office; and farther still, the old Fulton street Presbyterian church, where Dr. R. W. Patterson used to preach, long used as a soap factory and planing mill. The Episcopal diocesan cathedral and the Free Methodist chapel are about the only Protestant church edifices remaining in use in a large and populous section of the city.

The Ohio election last week was for two or three days a grand Republican victory of 17,000 majority, and with such a preponderance of that party in the legislature that the re-election of John Sherman was assured. But the Democratic wire-pullers of Cincinnati have learned a thing or two from their compatriots in Chicago and New York and, realizing that the vote of the city will decide the fate of the legislature and of Sherman, they are fighting to keep back the returns and perhaps play the Mackin game. So ,as the week ended neither side would yield, and the Democratic press is managing to bring on a most desperate encounter. At one time last week a riot was imminent, and only the most earnest effort of prominent citizens prevented. Such an outbreak may occur no one can tell how soon unless the bummer politician is taken by the throat and such principles as ennoble the American platform actuate our citizens.

The Prohibition vote though not, perhaps, so large as many had anticipated was a fair one and a notable gain upon the St. John vote. It is estimated at from 20,000 to 30,000, or about double the vote of last year. In certain localities, as at Oberlin, there have been exceptional and cheering accessions to the Prohibition ranks, while the action of the party in some parts of the State in declaring "FOR OPEN METHODS" as opposed to the secret societies, is even better still. On all sides it is conceded that the Prohibition vote gained as much from the Democrats as Republicans. This was to be expected from the position of the party and Gov. Hoadly, its mouthpiece, who declared openly in favor of the saloon and forced the fighting on that line. Foraker and the Republicans trying to avoid it, yet were opposed to prohibition. The vote therefore it was foreseen would be close, and the liquor men saw their opportunity. They held the casting vote. The liquor associations met in all the cities on the Sabbath before the election to decide the matter, and no one who had carefully reviewed the situation could doubt that they were as safe with the Republicans as with either and the Germans had always voted with that party. The Prohibitionists may add this then to their record that they have narrowed the issue in Ohio until both the great parties have fallen into the hands of the saloonist.

The late Earl of Shaftsbury was one of the most eminent examples of Christian philanthropy. For many years he took an independent part in politics devoting himself to the amelioration of suffering and to the improvement of the condition of the working classes. He was oftener, probably, chairman of public meetings than any other man of modern times. He thus came to be well known by large classes of of people, and his uniform practical benevolence endeared his name to the masses. At his funeral a dense crowd filled Westminster Abbey and hundreds of poor people were compelled to stand without in the rain. The Philadelphia Press tells a good story of the Earl, which racily illustrates the popular respect shown towards him even by the criminal classes, who, recognizing in him an impartial lover of mankind, became themselves the guardians of his property, proving how much better than bolts and bars is a well-earned reputation for philanthropy. The story goes that once the Earl of Shaftsbury lost his watch while walking in the New Cut, an unpleasant neighborhood infested with vile characters. He advertised his loss, as he valued the trinket for certain associations. Within twenty-four hours his household was aroused by a violent ring and knock at the street door, and the wheels of a vehicle were heard rapidly disappearing in the distance. On opening the front door a sack was found filled with something that moved. On investigating the sack a boy of the Artful Dodger class was found, bound hand and foot and gagged. Round his neck was the missing watch, and underneath was a placard with the words: "Lock 'im up, mi lord, he's a disgrace to ourn perfession, he order known as how yer lordship was free of the wud; giv' 'im five years 'ard. Yer Friends." The Earl did not take the advice of "his friends." He reformed the Artful Dodger, and eventually he became a light of the London shoeblack brigade.

JEFF. DAVIS.

BY GEO. W. CLARK.

The bold hero, indeed, lackaday!
Too cowardly to fight, so ran away,
And thereby "lived to fight another day."
But, alas! in taking his inglorious flight,
Was caught in rather a ludicrous plight,
His denials to the contrary notwithstanding.

It is of no earthly consequence, perhaps, whether Jeff Davis attempted to escape in his wife's garb, or whether he attempted to elude the boys in an "old wagou," or whether he went up in a balloon never to be seen or heard of again. A man so utterly destitute of moral principle and of patriotic feeling as to plot and organize treason against one of the most liberal and democratic governments on earth,—a government of the people, by the people, and for the people,—I repeat, a man so utterly selfish and unprincipled as to organize and involve the country in a terrible fratricidal war with all its barbaric horrors and miseries, and all for the maintenance and perpetuation of the inhuman system of chattel slavery —of such a man, I say, it would be marvelous, indeed, if he did not lie about his humiliating defeat and his inglorious attempt to escape from his captors. It was natural enough he should make a desperate effort to evade the doom which he knew he justly deserved for so atrocious a crime; and it was equally natural he should resort to the most promising expedient under the circumstances, to accomplish his purpose;—and then what could you expect but that such a man should lie about it?

You ask the "old Liberty Singer" for information on the subject. My son, George W. Clark, Jr., was captain of the company, under Col. Pritchard of the 4th Michigan Cavalry, which surrounded the camp and captured the rebel squad. My son was writing a series of letters at the time from the army which were published in the Rochester Democrat. He was on the spot and familiar with all the facts in the case and kept us posted. I quote from the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle:

"We have before noticed that our fellow-townsman, Mr. George W. Clark, had a son in Col. Pritchard's 4th Michigan Cavalry, which captured the flying rebel, Jeff. Davis. Capt. Clark sends the following highly interesting account of the movements of General Wilson's forces in his great raid through Alabama and Georgia, and the capture of Jeff. Davis, both of which he participated in:

"'On the morning of the 7th of May, 1865, General Wilson received intelligence that Jeff. Davis was somewhere in the lower part of Georgia trying to effect his escape. On the evening of the 7th Col. Pritchard received orders to take his regiment and go in search of the fleeing rebs. We hurried out about nine o'clock and marched south all night and halted about 10 o'clock A. M., and fed. We then moved on through Hawkinsville to Abbeville. Here Col. Pritchard took fifteen men from each company and pushed on. On the evening of the 9th we ran across a negro who told us of a camp of rebs about a mile west of Irwins, Irwins county, near a small creek. About 10 o'clock we surrounded the camp. One company was sent round to the road in the rear of their camp and the balance of the regiment was formed in the road ready to charge in at the first peep of dawn. They had no pickets posted and evidently considered themselves in a state of security.

"'At daylight, at a given signal, we charged into the camp, Capt. Hudson leading the advance. No resistance was made. The teamsters had just fed their stock, and the occupants of the wall tents were yet in the arms of Morpheus, until aroused by the shouts of our soldiers. The camp was immediately surrounded to prevent any escape. Jeff. and his lady hearing the noise, made preparations to decamp. Hastily jumping out of bed Jeff. donned his wife's dress, threw a shawl or hood over his head, and with his wife on one side and his wife's sister on the other, came out of the tent and passed to the rear. There they ran onto one of the videttes, who halted them, and asked them where they were going. Mrs. Davis said they wanted to go to the spring to get some water for her mother!—meaning Jeff. George Munger of Company "C," who was the vidette, said, "I don't care where you want to go, but that woman with the man's boots on must stay where you are!" He then escorted them back to Col. Pritchard where poor Jeff. was allowed to assume his proper apparel. Jeff. said to Col. Pritchard, "Sir, do you call this honorable! this thieving charge into the camp of helpless, unprotected women and children? I pronounce it theft! theft!"

"'The party was traveling with five wagons and three ambulances with no escort: Jeff. having dispensed with his escort some days before. The party consisted of Jeff., his wife and four children, General Reagan, Col. Harrison, Col. Johnson, Col. Morris, Col. Lellock, Lieut. Hathaway; also Mrs. Davis's sister and her brother, and the young lady's waiting-maid. While these events were transpiring a party came up the road in the rear of the camp and attacked Lieut. Barinton and his camp. They were supposed to be the First Wisconsin, of McCook's Division. Lieut. B. hailed them and told them he was of the 4th Michigan, but they paid no attention to him, and as he could not decide whether they were rebels or our solders, on account of the gray uniforms which they wore, the skirmish commenced in dead earnest, and before the mistake was discovered we lost two men killed and Lieut. Boutelle wounded. This was a sad affair and threw the whole party into deep gloom. But the capture of Jefferson dispersed this feeling.

"'The prisoners were placed under a strong guard and we turned our faces for Macon, which place we reached on the 13th ult. Jeff. rode on horseback and in the ambulance with his wife and children. At night their tents were pitched for them and they were made as comfortable as circumstances would permit. Three lines of guards were posted around their tents, the whole enclosed in a hollow square, so that all chances for egress or escape were completely cut off. Some of our boys called Jeff. an old rascal, etc., when Col. Johnson called Col. Pritchard and said, "Colonel, your men are insultiug the President!" Col. Pritchard assured him that every respect should be shown Mr. Davis while under his charge. On the morning on which the capture was made Mrs. Davis called Lieut. Davis into the tent and said to him, "Lieutenant, do not allow your men to agitate the President, for he is a very desperate man!" Lieut. Davis replied in a very polite manner, "Madam, I do not suppose there is a man in this regiment who is at all afraid of the 'President!" When coming to Macon President Lincoln's proclamation was handed Jeff. Davis. At first he turned white and red by turns, then trembled violently. He had heard nothing of it before.

"'Jeff. Davis wore a suit of gray cassimere, with top-boots, a light-colored felt hat, linen shirt and buck-skin gloves; appeared about 60; wore gray whiskers and gray mustache and gray hair; talked very little; appeared morose and taciturn. Mrs. Davis is large, coarse, has swarthy complexion, large mouth and teeth and slightly inclined to embonpoint; has black hair and eyes, but is not intelligent looking. Most of her leisure was spent in reading her Bible to Jeff. The children are intelligent, appearing well-bred, and withall good-looking. The eldest is about nine years of age. They were escorted to the Lanier House by the 4th Michigan Cavalry, where they alighted and were conducted to their suite of apartments to prepare for an audience with General Wilson, and make preparations for their journey to Washington. Macon was crowded with citizens and soldiers all anxious to get a glimpse of the "President!" Good order was maintained throughout and every respect shown the "state prisoner!" At 7:20 the train bore the party towards Washington accompanied by Col. Pritchard and a portion of the 4th Michigan, who are to escort him to Washington, via Atlanta, Augusta and Savannah. On this campaign we marched incessantly, captured their four principal inland cities, destroyed millions of dollars worth of public property and burned millions of dollars worth of cotton.'"

In addition to this account I quote a few extracts from the official reports of Col. Pritchard, Gen. James H. Wilson and Adjutant J. G. Dickenson, all of the 4th Michigan Cavalry, and who were personally knowing of the facts and circumstances of Mr. Davis's capture, and whose statements completely confirm the report above made by my son; and which prove the denials made by Jeff. Davis and his Postmaster, GeneralJohn H. Reagan, to be false.

Gen. Wilson says: "It is as certain as any fact in history can be, that Jeff. Davis was halted while attempting to escape from camp dressed in a woman's full-length traveling robe and a shawl, accompanied by two women and seeking in the early dawn to pass himself off as a woman."

Col. Pritchard of Allegan, commander of the regiment, in his official report made to Secretary Stanton of the capture of Davis, says: "May 25, 1865.—On the afternoon of the 23rd I received orders from the War Department through General Wilson, directiug me to procure the disguise worn by Davis at the time of his capture, and proceed to Washington and report to the Secretary of War. Accordingly I went over to the steamer Clyde and received from Mrs. Davis a lady's waterproof cloak or robe which Mrs. Davis said was worn by Mr. Davis as a disguise at the time of his capture, and which was identified by the men who saw it on him at the time of his arrest. On the following morning the balance of the disguise was procured, which consisted of a shawl, and was identified and admitted to be the one by Mrs. Davis. These articles I brought to Washington and turned them over to the Secretary of War."

Adjutant J. G. Dickenson of Detroit, in his report made weeks before either General Wilson's or the Reagan letter, says: "I recollect distinctly the capture of Jeff. Davis by the 4th Michigan Cavalry. I was personally present when Davis endeavored to escape from his camp in female attire, when with the assistance of three of our men I arrested and put him under guard. While I was talking with B. N. Harrison, Jeff.'s secretary, private Andrew Bee of Company L called to me and said, 'There goes a man dressed in woman's clothing!' As I turned he pointed towards three persons moving towards some thick, dense woods near the camp. They were moving slowly and closely together. The one in the middle was tall, the dress not being long enough to cover a pair of boots and spurs. They had passed Andrew at the spring of the wall tent which was nearest to where I stood, saying something about going for water. I was impressed at once that this was Jeff. Davis, and I spurred my horse forward shouting "Halt! halt!" and as I reached them with my revolver bearing upon Davis, the party halted. Then up dashed two of our men, Corporal Munger of Company I, the other's name I do not remember. They came up on the right flank and at once took in the whole emergency, for they brought their arms to bear upon Jeff. instantly. The tall figure was not to be mistaken though dressed as a woman. The dress was not a perfect-fitting garment, but was unmistakably a woman's dress. Besides the dress, he had closely about his head and shoulders a black shawl or mantel, which concealed his face and shoulders, but through the top of this I could see his gray hair. Both the other women were bareheaded; one was in a loose night dress which showed much haste in her preparation. This was Mrs. Davis. The other was completely attired, and proved to be Mrs. Davis's waiting-maid. One of the women cried piteously. I ordered the whole party back to their tents to which they moved slowly and reluctantly."

My son, Captain Clark, and the officers above named, from whom I quote, are all still living and can verify these facts. They are matters of record and so will go down the stream of time as a strange page in history. The fact is, from the beginning of his secret plotting for the overthrow of this government that he might build a slave empire on its ruins; through all the stealthy steps of his treachery; through the covert removal of war munitions from the North to the South; the denouement of his treason and rebellion with all its horrors and sufferings; his inhuman treatment of our defenseless soldiers in his prison pens; the shameful abandonment of the people he had duped into such a needless and fratricidal war, to suffer the consequences; to the disgraceful and humiliating finale—or "fizzle," crawling out in "woman's guise"—Jeff. Davis proved himself not only a traitor but a "sneak," and merits the scorn and contempt which the world justly pours upon him.

CAGLIOSTRO, FREEMASON, AND PRINCE OF IMPOSTORS.

Carlyle has made some impression on the world by his sledge-hammer strokes at all manner of shams, couched in language not always fully appreciated by the common people, but enjoyed by those who can at once feel the full force of his style. It need not surprise any one that such a writer, who commands readers among the most talented men in different countries, occasionally tears the mask from such glaring pretenders as Freemasonry and kindred orders, ancient or modern. Illustrative of his style we subjoin a few extracts from "The Diamond Necklace," which may be new to some of our readers. The topic has reference to the time of the French Revolution, when the Masonic virtues of secrecy and silence consigned their suspects to the dungeon and guillotine:

"By the side of the River Seine walks, haggard, wasted, a Joaillier-Bijontier de la Reine with Necklace in his pocket. . . .

"The Quack of Quacks has now for years had him in leading. . . . Poor Rohan had become a dissolute, violent, vapoury mud volcano, but black Egyptian maize must be laid on him. . . . Let the orchestra, soft warbling, strike up their fara-tara, fiddle diddle dee!"

One man Carlyle dubs a "denizen of Rascaldom," another "a bottomless slough of falsity, vanity, gulosity, of foulest material. . . . His Columbs, demonic Masonries, Egyptian Elixir's, what is all this to the light-giggling (Madame) Lamoth."

By Cagliostro's "greasy, prophetic, bull-dog face, said to be the most perfect quack face of the eighteenth century, we can assure ourselves that all will turn to the glory of Monsigneur, to the good of mankiud, and of Egyptian Masonry. Tokay flows like water . . . suppers of the gods. O Nights, O suppers, too good to last!"

The Necklace trial lasted nine months (in 1786) "to the astonishment of parlementiers and quidnuncs in both hemispheres. . . How . . this most involute of lies is finally winded off to the scandalous-ridiculous cinder-heart of it let others relate."

Count Cagliostro, Arch Quack, etc., year of Lucifer, 5789, addresses his brethren as "Fellow Scondrels, . . gathered from the four winds . . as Conquerors of the Diamond Necklace. [Worth some $400,000.] As a public speaker, the spirit of masonry, of philosophy, philanthropy . . . impels to do it. Give ear, O fellow scoundrels, to what the spirit utters: treasure it in your hearts; practice it in your lives. Sitting in this central cloaca of nature . . a heart into which from all regions, mysterious conduits introduce and forcibly inject whatsoever is choicest in the scoundrelism of the earth. . . . . But the grand problem, fellow scoundrels, as you well know, is the marrying of Truth and Sham so that they become one flesh, man and wife, and generate these three: Profit, Pudding, and Respectability that always keeps her gig.

"Brethren, I said the old Christian sect was happily extinct. As indeed in Rome there goes the wonderfulest traditionary prophecy of that Nazarite Christ coming back and being crucified a second time there, which I see not in the least how he could fail to be . . (From) 'Christian whim' (persons) 'keep yourselves forever far.'

"But neither are we, fellow-scoundrels, without our Religion, our Worship, which like all true worship is one of fear. . . The cross . . the crescent. . . Have we not our gallows? Yes, infinitely terrible is the gallows: it bestrides with its patibulary fork the pit of bottomless Terror. . . Our god is one. Great, exceedingly great, is the gallows. . . . O, when with its long black arm it has clutched a man, what avails terrestrial things. . . . The ill-starred scoundrel pendulates between heaven and earth, rejected of both.

"Blow Spirit of Egyptian Masonry, blow aside the thick curtains of space! . . . Fire, wild billowing, enwraps the world. . . . Thrones, and Dubois Nitres, and prebendal stalls, . . and all the gigs of creation . . a king, a queen, Iscariot Legalite . . five millions of mutually destroying men. For it is the end of the dominion of imposture: . . a foulest Circe undertook to fatten thee, and thou hadst to fill thy belly with the east wind, and burst? By the Masonry of Enoch, No! . . . The red fire sea shall not consume thee. . . But, ha! O horror of horrors! Is it not myself I see? Roman Inqusition! . . . These Pinchbeck lips can lie no more!"

The close may foreshadow another overturn of society when Such "fellow-scoundrels" again control the government and social life of its officers. Let us watch against the causes of such catastrophy as the French Revolution record. "The conquerors, every one that trafficked (in the Necklace) have they not all had their due, which was death?"

"Wise men boded earthquakes" as Gœthe did, as our Abolitionists did, as our Anti-lodge men are doing. Shall our nation heed the warnings? T. H.

SUN WORSHIP AND THE THIRD DEGREE TRAGEDY.

The sun is released from the grave of winter, and finally restored to life and power by the vernal signs of the zodiac, or in other words, by April, May and June, aided by July.

Our ancient brethren observed that after the sun reached his lowest southern declination, and seemed to be slain, yet a few moments of time were added to the days, which they regarded as the birth of the sun or the new year, hence this became a great solar festival, and was enjoyed by them with the assurance that seed time and harvest would again gladden their hearts, and that the evil spirit of darkness that had slain the sun-god was now powerless to do further harm.

Christmas, the real birth of the new year, or the sun was apparent when the days began to lengthen, but the powers of darkness, spite the lengthening days, seemingly held the sun in its grasp through the winter months, but when the sun arrives at the vernal equinox and the evergreen is seen, he gives unequivocal tokens of a return to life and power. He greatly revives in light and heat in April and May, and the days rapidly lengthen, but he does not attain the summit of the zodiacal arch, until the summer solstice in June; nor does he regain all of his energy and power until he enters July, which, at the summer solstice, is in the constellation of Leo, the Lion.

When the sun arrives at the summer solstice in June, the constellation of Leo is seen a few degrees in advance, appearing to lead the way and to aid by his powerful paw (the strong grip of the lion's paw) in lifting the sun up to the summit of the zodiacal arch. April and May are therefore said to fail in their attempt to raise the sun, for he is hardly out of the cold grasp of winter.

But June succeeds by the aid of July, and the sun is elevated to his place of power and glory, and reigns through the summer and harvest.

Soon after leaving the "summit" the days begin to shorten as the sun declines toward the autumnal equinox, to be again slain by the three autumnal months, lie dead through the winter, and be "raised" again by the vernal months of spring. Each year the sublime tragedy is repeated, and the glorious resurrection takes place.—From the Freemason, Detroit.

CLUBISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

"In a sermon on the 'Modern Migrations of Nations,' by the late Rev. C. T. Collins, attention is called to the fact of the great multiplication of secret organizations in our modern American society. In Cleveland, for example, it is stated that 'there are one hundred and fifty-nine churches, synagogues, chapels and missions, and two hundred and eighty-three of what are practically secret societies, of sufficient importance for the directory.'

"The Vermont Chronicle adds: 'This condition of things, which prevails more or less everywhere, is worthy of serious attention in connection with the question of the reactionary influences of such societies, or any of them, upon the Christian church. Is it a sufficient reason in the case of Christian people for establishing or joining a new society that its moral aim is worthy, or its associations harmless? Is there not danger that when Christian men or women throw their energy into these organizations it will be at the expense of the pecuniary ability of the church, and the interest and devotion which that properly calls for from its members? We by no means take the ground that the church is the exclusive form of associations for benevolent, or social, or reformatory purposes, which is opened to Christian people. But we have a right to judge of other forms of association by their fruits. And in so far as these tend to weaken the church, or lessen the devotion to it, their influence is to be deplored.

"'The family, the state, and the church are the three divinely ordained centres for the crystalization of human society in its different relations, and whatever interferes with the arrangement of society about these interferes with its healthful order. No society has a right, on Christian principles, to live, which is a rival to the church. It can claim Christian support only when its work and influence are auxiliary to the attainment of the objects for which the church exists—at the most, when its influence is not detrimental to the church.'"

To this we may add that many churches are virtually "secret societies," and are managed upon the principle of secretism. A few men control and rule the church, and half the members do not know what they are doing nor why they do it. Of course meetings for worship are thrown open to the public, but when church members meet as such, outsiders are excluded.

But it may be said that they are excluded because they are not Christians; but such is not the fact. Let a Methodist Christian attempt to enter a Baptist church meeting, or let a Presbyterian Christian insist that he has a right to enter a Methodist Quarterly Conference, or an Episcopal Christian try to enter a Presbyterian Session, and it will not take him long to learn that he does not belong to that secret society.

Great as is the mischief done by secret societies to the church, which is thereby undermined and sapped of its strength and power, yet a much greater mischief is done to the cause of God by unscriptural and unchristian divisions which separate the people of God from each other, and exclude true Christians from the privileges of the heavenly Father's family. A man who becomes a Freemason is a Freemason everywhere. Wherever he can find a "lodge" he has a right to enter in. But a Christian entitled to all the privileges of the church on one side of the way, has only to cross the street to find another church where he has neither right, nor lot, nor part, nor privilege. A man may be a minister of the Gospel on one side of the way, accepted, honored, useful, and yet across the street he may go and come for years and never be recognized in his character as a servant of the Lord, because he does not belong to the religious secret society which assembles there. And this is simply because men have divided and scattered the flock of God, and are using their best endeavors to perpetuate those divisions and keep asunder those for whom the Saviour prayed that they might all be one.

Surely the presence of a multitude of secret combinations bodes little good to the church of Christ; especially when secret combinations are countenanced by ministers, fostered by church members, and used to supplant the church of Christ in its legitimate work. But more dishcartening and hurtful by far are the sectarian divisions by which the people of God scatter their forces, weaken their influence, consume their strength and waste their means, until they become the song of the drunkard and the scoff of the godless and the profane. "Holy Father, keep through thine own name those whom thou hast given me, that THEY MAY BE ONE, as we are.'—The Armory.

AN EXAMPLE OF MANLY INDEPENDENCE.

No one can read John Quincy Adams's fearless and eloquent letters against Freemasonry without marking the character described in the following from Zion's Herald:

While yet a young man of uncertain prospects, John Quincy Adams said, "With an ordinary share of common sense which I hope I enjoy, I can live independent and free; and rather than live otherwise, I would wish to die before the time when I shall be left to my own discretion." This manly utterance was the key-note to the remarkable career of Mr. Adams. To be free from dependence on the favor of individuals and parties, to be independent in his judgments and opinions, and to act as his conscience dictated, was the height of his ambition. He had the courage of this high ambition, and therefore he served his generation usefully and honorably. Young men in these days of place hunting will do well to shrink, as he did, from voluntary dependence on the capricious favors of men in power, and from slavish bondage to the opinions of other men. To be loyally free and wisely independent, gives strength and dignity to character.

The Beta Theta Pi College fraternity at its annual meeting on August 27th at the Lindell Hotel, this city, was presided over by B. Gratz Brown and its patron god Wooglin. We recommend such societies to all parents who send their sons and daughters to college, as the best organizations for lavish expenditure of money, doubtful moral and religious inculcations, and fruitful places to teach non-self-reliance, bumptiousness and frivolity.—The Midland.

A delegation of Pueblo Indians, from New Mexico were the other day in Washington protesting against the recent decision which defines them to be citizens of the United States. The decision is based upon the fact that before the Gadsden treaty of 1849 they were citizens of Mexico, and by that treaty were entitled to the privilege of citizenship in the United States. They do not want to vote and they do not want to pay taxes, and came on to state their objections to the new administration.

THE SECRET EMPIRE.

CHRONOLOGY OF REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES IN MASONRY.

MASONRY SPEAKS FOR ITSELF.

[From Hardie's Monitor, Edition of 1818.]

Before Christ 3875. Cain and his adherents, having been instructed in the sciences of geometry and architecture, by the first mason Adam, built a city, which he called Enoch, after the name of his oldest son.

The posterity of Cain, Jabel, Jubal, and Tubal-Cain, not only improved in Masonry and geometry, but made discoveries in several other useful arts. See Genesis 4: 17, 20, 21, 22.

2348. The ark, in which Noah and his three sons, Shem, Ham, Japhet, all true masons, were preserved, built.

2217. Nimrod, the grandson of Ham, and the founder of the Babylonian monarchy, built many cities in Shinaar.

1920. The masonic and other arts, which flourished amongst the Chaldeans, carried out of Chaldea and Assyria, to the Egyptains, by Abraham.

1252. The city of Tyre built, by a great body of Sidonian masons from Gabala, under their grand master and his wardens.

1117. The Phœnicians built the famous temple of Dagon at Gaza, which was afterwards pulled down by Samson, when 3000 of the Philistian chiefs were slain.

1056. Hiram, king of Tyre, as grand master, took upon himself the direction of the craft, erected many new cities and stately edifices in his dominions, and joined the city of Tyre to the temple of Jupiter Olympus, situate on an island.

941. Dresiphon and Archiphron, who had acquired the masonic art from some of those employed in the erection of Solomon's temple, superintended the building of the celebrated temple of Diana at Ephesus.

747. Nabonassar, called also Baladan, was an excellent architect, and greatly encouraged the craft, particularly in employing them in building the famous city of Babylon.

570. The walls of Babylon, the temple of Belus, a golden image in the plains of Dora, which was 60 cubits high, and 6 broad, and in value about fourteen millions of dollars, together with many other stately edifices, were built under the direction of Nebuchadnezzar, grand master.

536. Cyrus, founder of the Persian empire, appointed as grand master, for the rebuilding of the temple at Jerusalem, Zerubabel, under the title of Tirshatha.

520. Zoroastes, grand master of the Magi, in Persia, and his disciples, made great progress in geometry and the liberal arts, and erected many splendid palaces and temples in the empire.

29. The emperor Augustus encouraged the craft more than any of his predecessors. Under him and his principal warden the learned Vitruvius, the pantheon, the bridge of Arminium, the great forum, several temples, and a number of stately public edifices were constructed.

Jesus Christ, our blessed Saviour, the Great Architect of the Church, was born at Bethlehem in Judea, in the 4th year before the vulgar Christian æra, and in the year of masonry 4000.

After Christ 70. The emperor Nero, though an execrable tyrant, greatly patronized the fraternity.

The request was readily agreed to, and a book of constitutions, a list of the lodges under the jurisdiction of the English grand lodge, with the form a deputation, &c., elegantly bound, ordered to be sent as a present.

RETURNING TO THE OLD WAYS.

Bro. C. B. Ward, editor of the India Methodist Watchman, Secunderabad, Deccan, India, writes to the Missionary Review:

Surely the greatest need of the world is self-supporting, self-propagating Christianity. All societies and missionaries avow this and stoutly affirm that this is the aim of all their efforts. Merchants and speculators are wise enough in planting industries, trade and railways in the nations of the earth, even in the heathen nations, to establish them in a manner and on a financial basis within the resources of the country entered. But missionary enterprise has been less wise generally. Christianity to become self-supporting and self-propagating in India, or any other country, must be begun and run on a practical basis. All agree that the means and agencies for the ultimate capturing for God of heathen lands are in those lands before the missionary comes. It is then necessary to operate on a basis within the possibilities of those indigenous means and practicable to the indigenous agencies.

"From Government statistics we learn that 'four-fifths of India's 250 millions belong to the agricultural class; 190 millions of the 250 have an annual income per head of $10 to $4.' The Gospel has its way to win among the '190 millions.' Is the missionary enterprise set on foot in India, within the possibilities of the resources of these millions and thus practicable to indigenous agents or agency?

"We think but one answer is possible. We note first, with few exceptions, and they are not popular, that missionaries have come to India with their home, or occidental ideas of work, of building and of finance. The school buildings, mission houses, church buildings, methods of work, cost of administration, are far more occidental than oriental, and wholly and utterly beyond the means of the people to support or perpetuate. The natives see this and cannot by any means be persuaded to attempt either the support or propagation of an occidental Christianity. On the contrary, the inauguration they have witnessed suggests to them that the agents who thus inaugurate are within reach of stores sufficient for keeping up this style of things, and it is further suggested to them that there may be enough to spare to warrent their drawing on the 'meal barrel.' The sight of grandly equipped missionaries with plenty of money, grand houses, ten to fifty thousand rupee chapels and churches, stately colleges, seminaries, high schools, and thousands of common ones, with an army of well paid teachers, hundreds of whom are unconverted heathen,—all convey an idea to the ordinary native which stifles every generous instinct, and either he concludes nothing is needed or that he may get something from this apparent plenty. * * *

"It may be asked, what would we do? We answer, just what the Apostles did: 'Preach the Gospel!' Leave all the western trappings at home. Preach the pure Holy Ghost Gospel in India, and let it take shape in India, China, Japan, and Africa, without sin, but in the costumes of the countries respectively. Our day finds the world in a much better state for this order of things than when the Apostles planted Christian churches in heathendom, that sent help back to the poor saints in Jerusalem. To some this will look like going backward. Yet it is the quickest way to the conquest of the world for Jesus. Years to come will demonstrate this."

ADDRESS TO THE VOTERS OF THE AMERICAN PARTY IN THE STATE OF IOWA.

PREPARED BY ORDER OF THE STATE CONVENTION AT WEST BRANCH.

You are again besieged by frantic appeals for help from pretended reformers to vote for some individual or individuals to save some cause which is threatened with ruin. In the midst of the din and excitement on the eve of the election your attention is called to a few calm words on the real questions of the hour.

It is not the tariff, for what effect can the choice of a county or State officer have on that issue? Except that the choice of the members of the State Legislature involves indirectly the choice of a United States Senator.

It is in a measure prohibition, for all the parties have spoken publicly in their platforms on this question. The Democratic party has uttered its voice for license; the amount of the license is not of importance. The Greenback party, in fusing, has adopted the same principle. The Republican party has adopted prohibition "in obedience to the will of the people," but it is not to be a test of party fealty. We might be inclined to wonder why this distinction was made; but we see that party has honored the whisky men in its convention and on its ticket. Translated into plain English the platform means, we are compelled to submit to it much against our will, but we bow to the will of the majority, and therefore enact prohibition.

But while the enactment of the law was a grand success, the execution has been a complete farce. Men in office, who have sworn to execute the law, make the excuse for non-execution that it is unpopular, and then coolly inform the people who elected them to execute the law, that the people have the law and now they ought to see that it is enforced.

The American party of Iowa, at its State convention at West Branch, Aug. 27, 1885, resolved to make no nominations, but to select suitable men from the nominees of the other parties, and this choice was left to the judgment of the executive committee.

The Prohibition party of this State, at its convention at Cedar Rapids, so far respected our conscientious convictions as to nominate men not only unobjectionable, but very acceptable to the executive committee. These men, whose names you will find in the Free Press, are in every way worthy of your suffrages. The American party has not lost its organization, nor united with the Prohibition party permanently. But during this campaign let us support and vote for the same ticket in the hope that they will be able to work harmoniously together in the future.

But let not the members of the American party be deceived by the secret orders, even such as are professedly formed for laudable ends. Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. Let them watch all the contests closely and with a firm trust in God, who overrules the actions of men for his own wise purposes, let them cast their ballots in such a manner as will defeat the plans of the men who plot in the dark and hidden recesses of the lodge. Let us remember all the injustice and rascality that goes unpunished. Let us do right under all circumstances. Cherishing no personal animosities toward those who differ from us, earnestly desirous that the slaves of the secret empire may be freed from their thralldom, with malice toward none, with charity toward all, animated by a high, noble, chivalrous purpose, let us go forward, bearing our testimony against the evils that threaten the very existence of our free institutions. We look not for victory this year; we have no hope for it next year. But we know that our humble efforts now are the seed of the future triumph. In the moruing, then, "let us sow our seed, and in the evening withhold not our hand, for we know not whether shall prosper either this or that." Our Father in heaven who sends the rain and the sunshine, who gives the increase to our planting and watering, who turns the hearts of the children of men as the rivers of water are turned, will in his own time and way bring the glorious and abundant harvest. While it is true that every little movement does not develop into a mighty one, yet it is likewise true that every great movement among men has started from a small source. The great movements of the world have had very humble and unpropitious beginnings, and very few could foresee the grand results which time developed. A little band of heroes agitated the slavery question, and a great party to-day lives and flourishes on the deeds and glory of those men. Brothers, be true to your principles, and God will be true to you.

George Warrington, Chairman of Committee.

FINANCIAL.

Friends of the Reform:—Contributions in aid of the National Christian Association's work have been secured by personal solicitation, but no general appeal has appeared in your organ since the Washington purchase was completed. It seems now to be proper to state that funds are needed for the following reasons:

1. And in general. The subscription list of the Christian Cynosure, sales of publications and field collections in connection with lectures have felt the pressure of close times and have suffered in common with the general business interests of the country.

2. The field has been providentially and greatly enlarged and is constantly becoming more educational and religious in its character. The secret system has developed more rapidly, and is more thoroughly matured in the Southern than in the Northern States, where its ripe fruits appear. Men of penetration who have applied their minds to the investigation of the system and noted its workings with care, have reached the conclusion that the ultimate issue is to be between the church and the lodge, and between free government and a secret despotism. This fact is now being demonstrated in a way to convince many who were once incredulous, by the night raids on Countee and other ministers of the Gospel, whose only offense was leaving and speaking against what they saw to be a wicked and dangerous conspiracy. These men are "suffering persecution" for Christ's sake, having sacrificed position and support for the truth, and they are looking to the N. C. A. for sympathy and support. To forsake these brethren in an hour of such peril would be both cruel and wicked. The little done in this field by the N. C. A. has already produced marked and encouraging results, and with the hearty co-operation of Dr. Roy and the sympathy of the secretaries of the American Missionary Association and its agents and of Rev. H. Woodsmall and others, there is great encouragement to invest labor and means with every prospect of early and large results.

3. Another opening is among the population who have recently come to our country from foreign lands. The Swedish people are as a rule accessible and ready to give us an impartial hearing. The Welsh and Holland people are by conviction and constitution favorable to open and fair methods and many of the ecclesiastical bodies with which these and the more pious among our German citizens are connected are averse to secret societies. The Augustana Synod of North America with its theological seminaries, colleges, academies, churches and schools for primary instruction are accessible, and eager for the light. A number of influential ecclesiastical bodies among the Germans, close their doors against the night lodges and are ready to co-operate as fast and as far as they are informed. This work among the people of foreign birth like that in the South will be for a time largely in the nature of mission effort, sustained chiefly by those who have the cause at heart. When informed and aroused these people will not be surpassed in their practical opposition to lodge power in church and state, but they must be enlisted before taking place in the front ranks of the conflict. They are now acting largely on the defensive, but once in possession of the facts and ninety and nine out of every hundred will step into the front rank of aggressive movements.

This is not a fickle, fluctuating class who act hastily and then go back on the record, but every step in advance with them means a permanent gain to the working force in the cause.

4. Indications are highly favorable to a "Christian conference" of leading men in evangelical churches in this country, to discuss the effect of the secret system on the evangelization of the masses, and the administration of civil government, and to advise what measures are necessary to "save the church of Christ from being depraved and disintegrated, to redeem the administration of justice from perversion and our republican government from corruption."

Not a few "watchmen on the wall" and guardians of the public safety are alarmed at the wanton desecration of sacred things, and the indifference or inability of civil magistrates to protect the innocent and punish the guilty, and knowing the strength there is in unity they are beginning seriously to consider the necessity of conference in council and concert in effort to rid the church and nation of a common enemy alike to society, the state and the church. If, as now seems probable, these men should decide to hold such a conference, it would be a serious omission on the part of the N. C. A. not to heartily co-operate in the movement, sustaining it with means and whatever influence it might give to aid in securing a result so greatly desired by every true friend of the reform against the secret system. If you are a friend what can you do and how much will you give to help on the work?

LITERATURE.

Between Two Opinions.—A portion of the first edition of our new book, "latest and best," is promised from the bindery next week, handsomely bound in cloth; price one dollar. Get the book for fireside reading as the evenings grow longer. No story has lately issued from the press more chaste in sentiment, more true to fact, more fearless in assailing entrenched and popular evils. It is emphatically a book for home reading and fireside discussion.

The Essays of Elia, by Charles Lamb, with an introduction by Alfred Ainger. pp. 236. Price, cloth and gilt, 50 cents. John B. Alden, New York.

Charles Lamb, though he spent the thirty-three best years of his life as clerk in the India office in London, yet was an intimate friend and companion of Coleridge, Wordsworth, Hunt, and Hazlitt, and engaged in a number of literary ventures. His poetry and dramatic writings have been long since forgotten, and like the author of Pilgrim's Progress and Robinson Cruso he is best known by one book—this volume of quaint, graceful essays full of the tenderderest humor and charming old-fashioned sentences, which remind the reader as much of his familiarity with the old dramatists of the age of Elizabeth, as of the family misfortunes of Lamb himself. He never married, but devoted himself unselfishly to the care and support of an only sister, who in a sudden fit of insanity stabbed her own mother at the dinner table. With this sister he wrote the well known "Tales from the Plays of Shakespeare," and some of his critical papers are considered among the finest in the language. "There are books," says a writer, "which one reads once in his life time, perhaps twice, or may be three times, and then has no more to do with them. Quite otherwise is it with Elia. One takes him up at forty as cheerily as he did at twenty; and at sixty, or may be seventy or eighty, as cheerily as he did at twenty. Elia is in fact what Keats dreamed of but never came to realize: 'A joy forever.'" Mr. Alden presents these essays of Elia in the very best form for the reader. There are, all told, twenty-eight of them, and they fill a little volume of apout 240 pages, just the size and shape to be held in the hand and read easily and with pleasure. Prefixed to this volume is a clever introduction by Mr. Alfred Ainger, which leaves little to be desired in its way of criticism.

The Century for October is a biographical number. A portrait of Samuel Bowles, well known as one of the leading editors of the country through his work in the Springfield Republican, is accompanied by an article, "A Study in Independent Journalism," by George S. Merriam. "The Last Days of General Grant," by Gen. Adam Badeau; "Lincoln and Grant" by Gen. Horace Porter; "Reminiscences of General Grant" by Gen. James H. Wilson, are timely sketches of the great commander which are a valuable contribution to the popular information, though the newspaper press seemed to exhaust the subject. In General Porter's article is quoted a sentence from Grant's response to President Lincoln when commissioned lieutenant-general, in which he says that if the responsibilities that weigh upon him are met it will be "above all to the Providence which leads both nations and men." Such an acknowledgement of Divine power at the time gives us a bright view of the inmost heart of the man. The finely illustrated articles are "The Great River of Alaska," "The Summer Haunts of American Artists," "Tuscan Cities" and "Riverside Park."

The current number of St. Nicholas completes the twelfth volume of this entertaining and richly illustrated monthly for young readers. We almost regret the conclusion of E. P. Roe's "Driven back to Eden," which is a very instructive history of the first season of country life enjoyed by a family reared in the city. The story of every day work and pleasure is charmingly told. "Among the Lawmakers" yet continues the experiences of a page in the Senate Chamber. The philosophy and beauty of Greek architecture is told in "Those Clever Greeks," and some things valuable in natural history are written in "Honey-hunters" and "War with the little Redskins;" while every little girl will be fascinated with "Peggy s Garden."

The North American Review began a series of war articles in its October number, with a review of the contributions of McClellan and Fitz John Porter in the Century, on the Seven Days' Battles before Richmond and the changes of base to the James river. Both threw the blame for McClellan's failure upon the authorities at Washington, but their reviewer shows from their own statements that this is but a deception, and that McClellan must himself bear the blame. The Review proposes to follow this article with a war series by General Beauregard, who will write four articles on "The Shiloh Campaign," "The Defense of Charleston," "The Drury Bluffs Campaign and The Defense of Petersburg." They will begin in the January number of the Review.

General Grant's paper on Chattanooga will be printed in the November Century. It takes up the writer's military career at Vicksburg, and follows the campaign of Chattanooga from the beginning of his connection with it. The motives and conduct of the campaign are said to be set before the reader fully and clearly, and with much personal interest. His Wilderness article, which is to follow soon, is a description of the preparations made for the Wilderness campaign, by which General Grant meant the movement of all the Union armies begun in May, 1864.

George W. Clark, the veteran speaker and songster, of Detroit, will have out in a week or two "The Songs for the Times," which will doubtless prove the popular Prohibition and reform song book of Michigan. It will cost about 30 cents. We bespeak for it an immediate as well as hearty welcome.—The Center.

It is announced upon authority that Mr. Kasson, of Iowa, has begun the preparation of his long-projected work on the diplomatic history of the United States during the war.

A number of letters from Ralph Waldo Emerson to Thomas Carlyle have been stolen, and the public are cautioned against the purchase of the same.

Representatives of forty-seven G. A. R. posts of N. Y., have issued a circular requesting the blacklisting of all members of the legislature who have not favored such legislation as will give special privileges to members of the G. A. R. They think they "deserve some shadow of gratitude from our State and national governments. We are not disposed to undervalue the services of the soldiers in the late war, but if any class of men ever received recognition, gratitude and compensation, it is those who served in the army for the suppression of the rebellion. A secret conspiracy to blacklist honest legislators who vote as they think will not materially help the men that are engaged in it, and if the G. A. R. is lending itself to such purposes it will soon cease to have the respect of all fair-minded citizens. —American.

—Mr. Moody has had so many and such pressing calls from all over the North, that he has been compelled to postpone his promised visit to the South until after the first of January. We had hoped he would reach some of the more important points early in the winter, and give the winter's work a good start. For the cotton States, however, the time for the best work is after the holidays. The cotton business absorbing every one during October, November, and December. But after the first of January there is lots of time for Christian work; the rainy season is nearly over, and till the first of May, the choice month of the year, Mr. Moody has promised to hold evangelistic meetings in New Orleans, and has invitations from the ministers and associations at Mobile, Selma, Marion, Nashville, Chattanooga, Knoxville and other points.—Y. M. C. A. Watchman.

—The Romanists tell us in one breath that Cardinal McCloskey was a good Christian, and we do not question it; but they tell us in the next that his soul has entered Purgatory, from which undesirable locality it can be liberated by prayers offered to the Virgin Mary and to the saints, socalled. This we do question, maintaining that it has no warrant in Holy Scripture, is a human invention, and makes the sacrifice of Christ of no effect. Yet the Papal body puts crosses on church steeples, on its altars, on the robes of its priests, while robbing the cross of its meaning and power.—Intelligencer.

At one of the stations on the Chicago and Northwestern railroad recently, an anxious inquirer came up to the door of the baggage car and said, "Is there anything for me?" After some search among boxes and trunks, the baggage master rolled out a keg of whisky. "Anything more?" asked the wet grocer. "Yes," said the baggage man, "there's a gravestone that goes with that liquor." The countenance of the whisky man assumed a wrathy but thoughtful appearance, the door was shut with a slam and the train moved on.—Union Signal.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NO SHADING OFF IN WORSHIP.

Dear Cynosure:—A commentator on Jehu says that the Jeroboam worship at Dan and Bethel "was really the worship of Jehovah, though in an unlawful manner, and therefore probably Jehu did not feel the same obligation to suppress it as to destroy the worship of Baal."

I don't question the greater difference between the worships of Baal and that of Jerusalem, than between the calf-worship and that at Jerusalem; but is not a forgery by its exact resemblance equally as bad and more deceitful than direct opposition to truth? It seems to me that no "real worship of Jehovah" can exist where God's own law of worship is set aside. Such worship as man may invent or adopt to promote his own ends, as Jeroboam's was, cannot be any more acceptable to God than any other which the devil may suggest or man invent, however gross and abominable.

We are too often met with Masonic sophistries to allow such reasoning to pass unchallenged. For if the Jerusalem worship could be set aside for that of Dan and Bethel, as it was by the ten tribes, so may the true worship now be set aside for the inventions of Rome or of Mormonism, or even of Freemasonry, in each of which systems men claim to be worshipers of the true God. In reality it is less difficult to convert publicans and harlots and have them enter the kingdom of God than such self-deluded scribes and pharisees, even as Christ said. Because Masonry teaches the resurrection by a shameful farce and pretends to worship the Creator under the strange name, "Grand Architect of the Universe," it is by no means acceptable to God. In vain, says Christ, ye worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments or inventions of men. The worship established at Jerusalem was prohibition of every other. T. H.

THE N. C. A. AND THE CYNOSURE NEEDED IN THE SOUTH.

Gibbs Cross-Roads, Tenn., Oct. 6, 1885.

I have no language with which I can express my thankfulness and appreciation of your favor of September the 28th. I felt that in the loss of the Cynosure I would lose a near and dear friend and wise counsellor. May God, "who doeth all things well," abundantly bless the kind friends who send it to me. While I have taken great interest in the Cynosure since I began to read it two years ago, I am now brought under renewed obligations to do all I can for it. I read the papers then hand them to others. Eternity alone can reveal the good already accomplished in this country through this means. I have been showing the danger and inconsistency of Christians affiliating with the lodge, by sermons, lectures, and, as you already know, have not shunned to use my pen for Christ. And though I was the first to speak out publicly and to be persecuted, others are being awakened. The National Christian Association can scarcely find a better field than this to work in. Will not they send a lecturer? May God bless you. W. H. Smith.

THE GOOD TEMPLARS AND PROHIBITION.

Spencer, Tioga Co., N. Y., Oct. 8, 1885.

Editor Christian Cynosure:—You say in the Cynosure of the 17th of September that the "Grand Lodge of Good Templars of the State of New York resolved that it was inconsistent for Good Templars to sign petitions for saloon licenses, and that three hundred members left the lodge on account of that vote. The Grand Lodge itself voted against the St. John or prohibition party."

I had a talk with the delegate from the Good Templar lodge of this place to the Grand Lodge of the state; he says there was no such thing done, or vote taken in Grand Lodge at all. He pronounces it a deliberate falsehood, and says there was something said against signing saloon licenses, but no vote taken. He says he was there during the entire session, and saw and heard all that was done.

Likewise you say in the Cynosure of Oct. 1st that the "Grand Lodge of New York cast a two-third vote against the prohibition party." He says that is also a falsehood, and claims the Good Templars are in favor of the prohibition party. He is the Methodist Episcopal preacher of this place (Spencer) and says he don't know anything about Masonry, and I think he don't want to know.

I feel deeply interested in the Christian Association, formed against secretism of all kinds, and in favor of the American party and vote that ticket, and in favor of prohibition, both State and National. I hope as a party we will keep our hearts and hands clean from falsehood and trickery, and not be like the other political parties. Let us stand with God and all will be well. We are gaining ground. I hope you will find out whether your informant or this preacher tells the truth, and so publish it.

Daniel Mabee.

PITH AND POINT.

THE NEW BOOK.

I read with interest 'Between Two Opiuions," and was gratified with the sentiments expressed, and noticed the reference to the Board of Trade, as though all sin was not contained inside of the lodge. The principle does not stop there, for it is not hard to see some likeness to Freemasonry (though not the oaths and silly ceremonies) in nearly every organization, so that we can well nigh say, to some extent every man is a Freemason. There is lots of truth contained in the article from the Interior by F A. Shaw, "Popularity versus Principle."—A Birth right Quaker.

ANOTHER FRIEND IN FLORIDA.

I have taken it from its commencement and value it highly. Expect to be a life subscriber. I look upon secreey and intemperance as two great moral evils which are corrupting, and, if not cheeked or put down, may finally destroy this government. We are going to Florida for our health and will try and introduce the Cynosure there.—Darius Reynolds, Belvidere, Ill.

QUERIES.

1. Will you please tell me the name of Rev. R. N. Countee's paper? What is its price per year? 2. Is J. P. St. John a member of the G. A. R ?—E. E. Browne, Martin, Green County, Wis.

1. The Living Way. Price, as we remember, $1.50 per year. 2. Ex-Governor St. John has been a member of but two secret societies, Freemasons and Good Templars.

FROM A SCANDINAVIAN METHODIST BROTHER.

While on a missionary tour through central Texas, I called at Bro. N. Jakobson's and found to my inmost satisfaction your clear and fearless paper, the Christian Cynosure I took three copies with me and read them through. I am in favor of and in sympathy with your anti-secret society spirit Put me down as one of your subscribers.—P. A. Juhlin, Galveston, Texas.

I have long been familiar with the Cynosure and at times a subscriber to it. I am very thankful to the donor of a years' subscription. I seldom fail to read it and it is read by every member of the family, and the reading-room copy is well read by the students. Respectfully,—(Pres.) J. S. McCulloch, Knoxville, Tenn.

BIBLE LESSONS.

FOURTH QUARTER.

STUDIES IN THE KINGS AND PROPHETS.

LESSON V. Nov. 1, 1885.—The Death of Elisha. 2 Kings 13: 14-25.

GOLDEN TEXT.—He being dead yet speaketh. Heb. 11: 4.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

COMMENTS ON THE LESSON BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. Bad men often reverence the good. v. 14. "Joash did evil in the sight of the Lord," reads the inspired history, "and walked after the sins of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin;" yet this did not prevent him from hearing the news of Elisha's fatal sickness with heartfelt sorrow. In his lament over him he recognizes the truth that all his armies were not so efficient a protection for his kingdom as this man of God. The instinctive, involuntary homage which the world always pays to true Christianity is the strongest possible proof that there it really such a thing. It is in itself a complete refutation of every infidel argument to the contrary.

2. Many a failure comes from lack of courage and faith; we stop short of God's intentions for us. vs. 15–19. We have here an exeeedingly interesting insight into the king's character. It was essentially a weak one. Joash must have understood from Elisha's preceding words that the command to smite on the ground held a symbolical meaning of the highest importance to himself and his kingdom. Yet he smites but thrice. He stops short at half a blessing because he lacks the courage and faith to grasp a whole one. Yet before we condemn him let us examine our own hearts and see if we are not ourselves doing the same thing. Who among us can say that he or she has grasped the full measure of the riches held out to us in the Gospel? How often we pray for some great blessing on ourselves or others but not with the importunate pleadings that refuse to be denied. Reform work has many a king Joash—men of small courage and less faith—who tell us that they hate Masonry, but do not believe it can ever be put down; who tell us they are prohibitionists, yet doubt if prohibitory laws can be enforced. The courage born of a sure faith that God will put down all evil, never stops short content with half results; never stays its hand at a few defeats of the enemy.

3. God's promises of mercy always meet with exact fulfilment. vs 20–25. The exact signification of the miracle wrought by Elisha's bones is not easy to see. But no miracle was ever wrought that did not have a beautiful and mysterious relation with the great central Miracle of Scripture. Neither did any promise of God ever remain unfulfilled. Three times Joash defeats the Syrian hosts in battle, but it must always have been a subject for keen regret that he by his weak indecision should limit the blessing to a partial instead of a complete deliverance.

LIGHT FROM THE WORD.

On what occasion had Elisha been a national protection? 2 Kin. 6: 9. What is the full measure of the spiritual joys which we may possess? 1 Cor. 2: 9.

Elisha the Prophet.—Ver. 14. The early history of Elisha is given in lesson ii., third quarter. His home was at the capital Nothing is recorded of him for 45 years after his anointing Jehu to be king. But the testimony of Joash shows that Elisha was of great value in the kingdom, more than horses and chariots. He was the foremost subject in the land. There is a mighty power in that quiet influence which puts its hands on the very helm of the government while it is yet unrecorded in history. Who can tell how much worse the kingdom might have been but for the influence of Elisha?—Pel.

Though the nine recorded miracles of Elisha often affected only individuals, and his days passed in the quiet of ordinary life, his influence was wide and powerful. Elijah had lamented at the end of his career the disappointment of his hopes. Elisha's life, if it knew no moments of supreme exaltation, closed amidst universal veneration. Nor did the veneration with which he was held cease with his life. A splendid monument raised over his grave near Samaria was shown with reverenee in after ages, and funeral dances were celebrated periodically in his honor round the saered spot where he lay.—Geikie.

"The chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof." The virtuous lives, the earnest prayers, the faithful testimony of the people of God do more to conserve the state than armies and navies. No amount of wealth or power can save a nation which is morally corrupt—N. Hall.

"Take bow and arrows." It was an ancient custom to shoot an arrow or cast a spear iuto the country which an army intended to invade. Justin says that as soon as Alexander the Great had arrived on the coast of Ionia he threw a dart into the country of the Persians. The dart, spear or arrow thus thrown was an emblem of the commencement of hostilities.—Burder.

"Elisha put his hands upon the king's hands." To signify that it was divine power operating through the king which was to be the real cause of his success.—Todd. In all we do let us ask God to put his hands on ours. Let us do nothing in which we cannot expect God's help. Let us put our hand to nothing in our own strength, but depending on him to give success.—Lewis

"The arrow of the Lord's deliverance." This was said to explain to Joash the meaning of the symbolical aetion and the one to follow. It meant deliverance from the power of Syria.—Peloubet.

"And the man of God was wroth." He was indignant that when such blessings were offered, when such deliverance for his native land was almost thrust upon him, such a noble and splendid career was opened before him, the young king should be so weak, so blind so wicked as to throw away his opportunity, and, like the swine, trample such pearls under his feet.—Peloubet

"Now thou shalt smite Syria but thrice." And from every one of his servants to the end of time, if you give them the Capernaum measure of faith, you shall have from them Capernaum measure of works and no more.—Ruskin.

The Design of this Miracle (1) Its significance is this: Elisha died and was buried as all men are, but even in the grave testimony was borne to his character as a prophet and servant of God, and in a manner which corresponds exactly to the form of activity of this prophet, who was a preserver, saviour and life-giver.—Lange. The Lord showed thereby that he was not the God of the dead, but of the living; that the dead in him live for him (Matthew 22: 32), and do not perish with the body. It was a testimony to the reality of another life—Peloubet.

"Three times did Joash beat him." Or "smite" him. The prophecy was fulfilled. Instead of following up his victories to the utter annihilation of the Syrian power, he was content with these three triumphs, and so justified the rebuke of the dying Elisha. Israel soon fell back into most bitter afflictions and extremity (chap. 14: 27). Whedon. And Joash himself not only followed the sins of Jeroboam, but attacked Jerusalem and carried the temple treasures to Samaria, the capital of his own kingdom (2 Kings 14: 12–14.

Dr. John Hall once said to theological students that the minister who should open up the beauties and treasures of the minor prophets would be doing for the Bible what Livingston and Stanley had done for the world in exploring Central Africa. What the nations of Europe recently regarded as little more than the lair of savage beasts and still more savage men, is now found to be a new world of commercial importance, worthy of diplomatic conquest. So the minor prophets will be found "profitable," not only for "instruction in righteousness," but also in social science.—W. F. Crafts.

FREEMASONRY.

False, more foul than false, and cruel most of all
Rampant and revelrous, God decrees thy fall:
E'en angels fell at thy polluting tact,
Apostacy eternal is thy crowning act.
Most cruel bondage of body, mind and soul,
Astute in badness man's being to control;
Supreme in falseness and hypocrisy,
One virtue claims – her secrecy,
Naught but doom from their first abode
Remains to rebels, and that doom from God;
Ye rebel sons of Baal, escape the mystic road.

STATUE OF "LIBERTY ENLIGHTENING THE WORLD."

More Money Needed.

The Committee in charge of the construction of the pedestal and the erection of the Statue, in order to raise funds for its completion, have prepared, from model furnished by the artist, a perfect fac-simile Miniature Statuette, which they are delivering to subscribers throughout the United States at the following prices:

No. 1 Statuette, six inches in height,—the Statue bronzed; Pedestal, nickel-silvered,—at One Dollar each, delivered.

No. 2 Statuette, in same metal, twelve inches high, beautifully bronzed and nickeled, at Five Dollars each, delivered.

No. 3 Statuette, twelve inches high, finely chased, Statue bronzed, Pedestal, Heavily Silver-Plated, WITH PLUSH STAND, at Ten Dollars each, delivered.

Much time and money have been spent in perfecting the Statuettes, and they are much improved over the first sent out. The Committee have received from subscribers many letters of commendation.

The New York World Fund of $100 000 completes the Pedestal, but it is estimated that $40,000 is yet needed to pay for the iron fastenings and the erection of the Statue.

Liberal subscriptions for the Miniature Statuettes will produce the desired amount.

AMERICAN PLATFORM.

ADOPTED AT CHICAGO, JUNE 20, 1884.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled condition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clannishness by which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile bands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruption, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; and having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and believing the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, both inevitable and indispensable:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, believing with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; believing in the Christian marriage, and not in Mormonism; believing in the religious democracy of the New Testament, and not in the despotism of the lodge; believing, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, not in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we abhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscience by human laws and penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly believe that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike foes to human liberty and welfare. We further most firmly believe that a government without God has none but lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a mere usurpation, we regard all religions and worships invented by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as mere swindling impositions and cheats. We believe in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly believe that the bravery and blood of our soldiers have bought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will be just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised by the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon be not only echoed by their voices, but sustained by their votes.

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following, as containing a brief synopsis of the principles of our government, by which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.

2. That the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.

3. That God requires, and man needs a Sabbath.

4. We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.

5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.

6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to benefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.

7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punishment of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.

8. We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage.

9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be preserved inviolate, and the same equality should be extended to Indians and Chinamen.

10. That international differences should be settled by arbitration.

11. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.

12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.

13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.

14. That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.

15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

The Christian Cynosure.

EDITORS.

J. BLANCHARD. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 22 1885.

The silent influence of the American party platform is forcing a recognition of God into other parties. A platform is a scheme of government, and a godless government is an absurdity.

"Pussy has got a nice tail." "Do not pinch or hurt it." "Bobby has a rocking-horse." The above is scarcely an improvement upon old Noah Webster's lessons for beginners. "No man may put off the law of God." "The wicked flee when no man pursueth." A school book with no standard of law or morals is like a world without cohesion or gravitation.

Men say gravely: "Public opinion will not sustain it," as though that was conclusive against a law or movement. Whereas, all the good done on earth has been begun in defiance of "public opinion."

The Birmingham Free Press prints from the Cynosure the sketch of a proposed General Convention of anti-secret churches: and influential persons and papers are giving their profound thought and correspondence to the subject.

Prohibition will never be enforced by Republican or Democratic constables and police. No fundamental reform was ever carried without its party, for no party can be pushed beyond the principles which elected it.

THE NIHILISTS are rapidly gaining converts in the Russian army, demanding the enthronement of the Duke of Edinburgh's son with a cabinet of Nihilists. If they succeed, it will only turn the people over to roast them on the same coals, but on the other side. The abolition of class, titles, and monarchy has made the United States, and nothing less will make a United States of Russia.

MIXED WORSHIPS.—Whatsoever hath a blemish, that shall ye not offer: for it shall not be acceptable for you. * * * Blind, or broken, or maimed, or scurvy, or scabbed, ye shall not offer these unto the Lord.—Lev. 22: 20, 22.

Thaddeus Stevens said of a procession of Odd-fellows marching near the Capitol: "They are not Masons, they are maggots which have crept out of the carcass of the old handmaid since we killed her." This language of Mr. Stevens may be thought rough; but we know lodges destroy churches: and what would have been thought of a Hebrew priest who should offer on God's altar the carcass of a lamb which had creatures in it which were destroying the meat? Such is the Lord's Supper to Knight Templars who take "the cup of devil's" wine from a human skull. It is mixing God's worship with Satan's.

"LIE LIKE A NEWSPAPER."—This is an old German proverb of a man whose statements are unreliable. Papers East and West, which wished the statement true, and to influence the pending Ohio election, said that the Grand Lodges of Good Templars in Wisconsin and New York both condemned the Prohibition party. Now both statements are denied on what seems good authority. It is a pity there are any secret lodges: they are always objects of suspicion: and because they are secret, concealing themselves from men, they give occasion for misrepresentation, generally unintentional.

FINDING THE SEAM.

Bradshaw's "Apology for the Puritans" (Neal, Vol. I., 248.) says: "The Puritans hold and maintain, that all inventions of men, especially such as have been abused to idolatry, are to be excluded out of the exercises of religion."

By Moses, the slightest departure from the pattern of worship shown him in the mount was held to be sinful, and the adoption of another system of worship was punished with death. In the New Testament the principle was as strict as the form was in the Old.

Who "the famous missionary," Dr. Lansdell, was, we no not happen to know. But we have known of missionaries, Catholic and Protestant, using these or similar means to impress savage or barbarous people with the importance of their religion. We clip the following from the N. Y. Tribune:

"Dr. Lansdell, the famous missionary, was warned when entering Bokhara that his conventional clerical garb would not impress the natives with a proper sense of the wearer's imortance. 'I had,' he related, 'the red hood I wear as a Doctor of Divinity, and my square college cap. I also had a very elaborate example of a sort of Persian waistcoat, which I had purchased as a curiosity. I had also, as a Freemason, my Royal Arch collar and apron and several Masonic jewels. Before entering Bokhara I put on my Doctor of Divinity hood, my Persian waistcoat, my Royal Arch collar and apron, all the Masonic jewels which I am entitled to wear, and, fastening my little traveling Bible to my Royal Arch collar, was presented to the deputation sent out to receive me. They were a very dazzling crowd, in gorgeous attire. They received me with great distinction, and I rode in at the head of a very gallant procession, one of the wonders of Bokhara; and I think I smiled frequently as I thought of the appearance I made, and contemplated the evident sensation I created.'"

Such tricks to inspire awe by what is not awful, are the stock in trade of religious orders and orders of nobility. It was by the absolute exclusion of the titles and toggery of nobility by State and federal constitutions, and making promotion depend on desert, that has placed the United States in the forefront in the race of nations; and if Europe was destitute of false titles and tinsel, Socialism and Nihilism would be as unpopular with the masses there as they are here.

Next to the approbation of God, human approbation is the dearest thing to the human heart. To win veneration by epaulets is easier than to gain it by the practice of virtue. Armies are held together by the hope of promotion; and the sham secret orders gratify this thing without either the toils or the dangers of war. Hence the lodges are thronged by inferior men, men who could never rise by open and honorable endeavor. The whole system is based on the falsehood of men seeming to be what they are not, and not seeming to be what they are. As Satan is "a liar from the beginning and the father of it," he is the god of all false, man-made systems; and this explains the ferocity of their penalties, oaths and inflictions. The head sorcerist of these shams was seen by John in Patmos, "DRUNKEN with the blood of saints!"

If the secret lodge-leaders had ability equal to their disposition, society would be uprooted by them. Their inferiority is the security of government and civil order. The French Reign of Terror, and the Mormon Mountain Meadow massacre are the natural product and brood of secretism and its oaths. The worst crimes ever committed by fiends are not as bad as the oaths of Masons swear them to be; and missionary Masons carrying the Gospel of Him who "in secret said nothing" do more to render Christianity contemptible than any class of felons. The Saviour likened such men to the contents of sepulchres, dead men's bones, worms, and rottenness.

DEATH OF CARDINAL M'CLOSKEY.

This occurred on Saturday, Oct. 10, 1885. We give below the Catholic Review's extended notice of the event. The Cynosure, anxious to do truth and simple justice, has credited the Catholic church, which existed centuries before there was a pope or popery, with the preservation of Christian doctrine; and with the sincerity of its communicants to this day. But no person of average sense who knows the Bible can avoid feeling sick at heart on reading this Cardinal's obituary, which we give entire. The idea of Mary, the mother of Christ, being the "Queen of Heaven," and the "powerful Patron" of a Romish priest dying in the city of New York, with the incantations over the dying man, are all melancholy mockeries, man-invented substitutes for the promise of Christ to come himself and receive dying Christians to himself as he did Stephen. John 14: 3.

The whole pageant is contrived to enslave the masses to a counterfeit priesthood. Cardinal McCloskey may have been an "old warrior of the Cross," but what battles he fought the record does not inform us; and the "solemn profession of the Catholic faith which the church exacts" from the dying, when too far gone to read or utter it, is a wicked absurdity contrived to compel obedience to the last gasp. A rational man would prefer the death of the beggar Lazarus at the gate:

"A great life went out yesterday. Quietly, painlessly, and in peace, the soul of a chief priest and prince passed to its judgment and reward. What that is, He who holds the balance, alone can say. Yet those who have so often witnessed the great things that Cardinal McCloskey, Archbishop of New York, wrought for Christ's kingdom may hopefully anticipate for them the hundredfold reward that belongs to even the modest service of good wishes. Certainly they may mourn that a great prince in Israel, a prudent counsellor and an apostolic priest, has departed from amongst them.

"The Cardinal-Archbishop's death was like his life, one of peace. His immediate preparation for it began last Sunday, the Feast of the Most Holy Rosary. Desiring to gain the indulgences specially granted for that day by Pope Leo XIII., and to manifest his sincere devotion to his powerful Patron, the Queen of Heaven, he arranged that shortly after midnight he should receive the Holy Eucharist, as he foresaw that it was impossible for him to remain fasting until the usual hour of even early Mass. He received the body of Christ with characteristic humility and desire. During the day his physician, Dr. Keyes, saw that he was rapidly losing strength. With a conscientiousness that is only proper in an honorable physician, but that unhappily is rare in days of unbelief, Dr. Keyes informed his illustrious patient and the attendant priests that the time had come at which it was prudent to administer Extreme Unction and to make the other preparations that a Catholic, particularly a Catholic Bishop, ought to make for his last moments. The Cardinal with that beautiful spirit of resignation to the Divine will which had always been characteristic of him, assented, and the Vicar-General, Mgr. Preston, was sent for and the last sacrament was administered. When the hour came for the solemn profession of the Catholic faith which the church exacts of her dying rulers, his Most Rev. Coadjutor, now his successor, the Archbishop-elect, his Secretary, Dr. Charles McDonnel, his former Secretary, Mgr. Farley, the Vicars-General and the priests of the Cathedral were present. Too weak to read the Profession, it was read for him, and he made manifest his assent to every article with great fervor. He received the Holy Eucharist again, this time as the Viaticum. The blessing of the Holy Father, briefly cabled by Cardinal Jacobini, brought consolation to him. The whole diocese—indeed, so far as the news could spread, the whole American church—was praying for the happy death of the old warrior of the cross. The Archbishop-Coadjutor left nothing undone to promote his comfort, and his former Secretary, Mgr. Farley, so long associated with him in the most filial and intimate relation, was hardly absent for a moment. At last, on Saturday morning, about 12:45 A. M., he quietly breathed his last. It was a happy coincidence that this most devout servant of Mary, who was Cardinal Priest of the Dominican Church of S. Maria, should have closed his life on this Saturday of the Rosary week."

WILL GEN. BUTLER JOIN THE AMERICAN PARTY?

Read the following from the Pittsburg Dispatch, Oct. 7th. The General who has taken thirty-three degrees, and been sworn all the way up, and, of course, is familiar with the murder of Morgan and the lodge-defiance of the laws, must have been sorely disappointed to find Masons capable of fraud and deception!

GENERAL BUTLER ON SECRET SOCIETIES.

General B. F. Butler, in a recent interview, explained the cause of his opposition to secret societies as follows: "I have no faith in secret societies. I lost confidence in them when I was in command at New Orleans. I had issued a proclamation forbidding all secret conferences among the citizens, for they were merely meetings of conspirators. I had succeeded in a tolerable degree in abolishing many of the meetings, although not without the application of strong measures, when I received information that the members of a lodge of Freemasons, under the guise of ordinary meetings, were conspiring to do harm to the Government. I am a Freemason myself, and one evening when I knew the conspirators were going to meet I cast aside my uniform, donned a civilian's suit and presented myself at the portals of the lodge. I knocked and gave the proper password and signs. Admission could not be refused and I entered and took a seat. I was probably the most familiar and the most talked of personage in New Orleans at the time, and I could plainly see that my presence was causing a sensation. When the 'good of the order' was called I arose and said: 'Brethren, I have positive proof that you have been holding meetings to devise plans to injure my Government and myself. I assure you that as a brother Mason I have the kindliest feelings toward you and yours, but I warn you that you must hold meetings for no such purpose in the future."

Addressing the two gentlemen who had called upon him, the General continued: "I reasoned with the members, and told them that the order of Masonry was not instituted for hatching conspiracies. I boldly expressed the utmost abhorrence of their conduct, and firmly but kindly gave them a proper warning. Some of the members expressed regrets at their course, and declared that they would not conspire further. I never heard of another Masonic conspiracy while I was in New Orleans, but when I left that lodge room it was with a sad and heavy heart, and I made a solemn resolutions that, if the high aims of secret societies could be thus perverted, I would never enter the portals of one again, and I have kept that resolution."

GIVING PLACE TO THE DEVIL.

EPH. 4: 27.

We give place to the devil when the sun goes down upon our wrath. Solomon gave place to the devil when he built a house and altar for his heathen Egyptian wife, though he put her and her idols away in a house by herself, for he said: "My wife shall not dwell in the honse of David, king of Israel, because the places are holy." He also "appointed the priests according to the order of David, and the Levites to praise and minister before the priests." Thus having satisfied the claims of religion he gave "place to the devil" by allowing seven hundred altars of spurious religions to be brought in by his political wives. And he made his Egyptain princess's house and surroundings of "costly stones" of eight and ten eubits, splendors which took with the masses and, as is always the case with mixtures of human and divine in religion, the human beat the divine, so that his realm became without coherence, like melted snow. When his successor, Rehoboam, took the sceptre neither oath, nor law, nor authority were respected. The nation had seven hundred worships and as many devils for gods.

Churches with lodge-worship in them "give place to the devil." The English State-church has fifty fast days, and one hundred festivals all of human origin. All these are places given to the devil in the church of God. The oaths and blasphemies of drunken Irishmen in the Rocky mountains outside of law and government were awful: but there is more "place given to the devil" in this one sentence of Queen Elizabeth to her Bishop Maddox, than in the swearing belched from the saloons of a continent: "Make the liturgy as evangelical as you can and keep the popish people in the church."

THE MEMPHIS ASSASSINS.

The Monday morning dispatches tell of a new and more desperate and devilish attack upon Bro. Countee at Memphis. While going to his home in the outskirts of the city after Sabbath evening meeting, accompanied by some twenty members of his congregation, he was fired upon while passing a street corner, by some unknown lodge desperado. The charge was buckshot from a shot-gun, and as may be easily imagined created havoc and consternation in the company. Two of the bullets struck Mr. Countee, one in his head, the other through his chin, producing painful, bnt it is believed not dangerous wounds. His brother, S. L. Countee, was also struck by two shot, one in the back and one also through the chin. His injuries are regarded as or a more dangerous character. Ellen Wright, a sister of the church, received a painful wound in the hip. The assassin after firing fled, but threw away his gnn, which was afterward found by the police.

Thus passed another act in this tragedy of cutthroat secretism among the colored people of Memphis. After attempting first to destroy the preacher by the wiles and blasphemy of the lodge; then his church by choking out its spiritual life and robbing its treasury; it then assails the pastor and attempts to massacre him and his family by firing into his honse at night; failing in this they now attempt to shoot him dowa like a dog while peaceably going home from the divine service in which he had just ministered.

Not long since when Rev. B. A. Imes, pastor of the colored Congregational church in Memphis, and not a member of any secret order, was debating publicly the usefulness of the societies outside of the church, the moment he mentioned the secret societies and called attention to their nnlawful oaths, a lawyer sprang to his feet and interrupted the speaker, saying that himself and a large number of men present "had sworn together and come there to prevent Masonry from being exposed!" The crowd then began yelling, "Kill him! kill him! Put him out! Away with him!" The meeting immediately broke up in confusion.

Such revelations of the lodge spirit, along with the late Morganizing among the Chinese lodges of Oregon, are appalling. They show that nnless the National Christian Association and its friends redonble their efforts in the South, the doors of opportunity will be closing soon against them. How long before the lodges may gain snch control in every Southern city as they have in Memphis, and their power become too haughty to yield to reason and the Word of God. Let these horrors cause ns to redouble our prayers to God for the deliverance of his people; and as we pray well, so shall we act well in this crisis. The Memphis brethren mnst be snpported in this battle.

—Pres. C. A. Blanchard is engaged to speak in the Second German Baptist church, corner of Willow and Burlington streets, Chicago, on Thursday of this week.

—Bro. Geo. T. Dissette after some days in house-to-house personal work in Du Page connty, went on Friday last to Itasca, in Cook county, Illinois, to follow np the opening made a few weeks ago by Secretary Stoddard.

—Dr. Darius Wilson, the great head center of the Memphis rite of Masonry which is such a bug-bear to the Scotch rite men, writes himself as 33°, 90°, 96° of the United States of America. He has been lecturing lately to the Masonic lodges of Colorado. He is the reputed founder of the Knights of Honor, Royal Arcanum and American Legion of Honor.

—The meeting appointed by W. B. Stoddard in the German Baptist church on West Huron street, thiscity,last week Wednesday evening, was addressed by his father. A good audience was present, and nothing more could be asked by way of earnest attention to the truth. Pastor Meier, with Bro. Aldswede, and other prominent members are in earnest in their efforts to instruct their people so that they may not fall into the lodge snare of the devil.

—Our "Secret Empire" department, omitted last week because of more important matter, contains a rare record of Masonic assumption. It is hardly befitting to fill our space with such stale falsehood, did not Masonry often reiterate the claims set forth in this compilation of sixty years ago. While the claim that these ancient kings, etc., were Masons is of course nntrue, the attaching of such names as those of Cain, Nimrod, Sanballat, Cæsar, Herod, Nero, etc., is not inappropriate to the spirit of the lodge. What blasphemy, on the other hand, to put in the same class with these murderers and tyrants of history, the name of our blessed Saviour!

—Bro. W. B. Stoddard left Chicago, where he has been doing a good work for a month, for Ohio last Wednesday evening. He reached Columbus next day and engaged a room at No. 214 West Second St., in the house of K. A. Orvis, an old and earnest friend of the reform. He finds fifty-seven secret societies represented in the city. He found directly a Methodist and Odd-fellow who believed there was much more religion in the lodge than the church. He will soon find out other friends in Columbus and rally them to prepare for the convention soon to be held in the city as provided by the State Association.

—The General Agent started Saturday noon for the convention in West Union, Iowa, expecting to remain over the Sabbath at Lanark, Ill., and speak if there was an opportnnity. There were two other urgent calls for him this week—the State convention in Fairmount, Indiana, and the bretüren at Albany, Missouri. He may visit Missouri before returning to Chicago and set the wheels of reform in motion again. Bro. Needels encourages him to come and there is some hope that Elder Smith of Maryville, may be induced to undertake the the lecture work. His experience with modern Masonic argument at Humboldt, Nebraska, has warmed his zeal for re form several degrees.

—Friend Clark, promptly responding, furnishes some proofs of Jeff Davis s attempted escape at the close of the war which carry conviction, and even the ex-chief rebel cannot satisfactorily dispute. We should be glad if we had as satisfactory evidence whether Davis was a Freemason or not. Some of our Anti-masonic writers have claimed that he is, but we know not on what anthority. The lodge publishes that he is not; but so its orators always prate of the Revolutionary generals—all were Freemasons but the traitor, Arnold, they say. But the fact is, as their own records prove, Arnold was a Mason, and the other generals uniformly were not. Perhaps the American, in some old blue book of Congress, might settle the question.

—Some of the temperance workers of this city have reproduced in fac simile an old copy of the Advocate of Freedom published in Hallowell, Maine, October 29, 1840. This paper was published under the direction of the Maine Anti-slavery society, and edited by Anstin Willey, our old reformer friend yet living in Northfield, Minn., as earnest for Christian reforms as in his youth. Though an Abolition paper it rings true on the temperance issue also. Years ago when Lewis G. Clark (the George Harris of "Uncle Tom") was lecturing in New England before the war, Mr. Willey went with him through the State of Maine, arranging for the meetings and attending to every detail that could contribnte to their snccess. This interesting reprint is for sale at the Cynosure office at 5 cents per copy.

—The Detroit Freemason, describing a large proportion of the men who advertise themselves as lodgemen, says: "The Masonic emblem on others means I wear this to deceive the world, to use it to cover rascality, to cheat, wrong and defraud their brothers, backbite and slander them, trade on the square and make you pay twice as much as a thing is worth. But these kind of people, like Judas of old, sell themselves for less than thirty pieces of silver. They are like water, thin, and always find their level. They need not be afraid to die, for they have no souls to lose. They are generally narrow-minded, close-contracted, pin-headed, poodle-dog men, stingy and mean. They are to the human family what warts are on the human body—excrescenses. We have no patience with them. Life is too short to try to make anything of them or out of them." This is nearly a slander on the Hiramites.

Knox College at Galesburg, Illinois, since it has become a nesting place for college secret societies among the students, and has a Freemason for its president, has been preparing for the denouement of a few days since. A party of students broke into the college buildings intent on mischief, when they were discovered by the janitor. This officer, the gang believed, had the assistance of another student in discovering them, and upon him they vented their wrath. That same Friday night they gutted his room and strung his bed-clothing over the grounds. Sunday night they rendered his room uninhabitable by throwing a bottle of some villainous-smelling stuff through the window. They also hung him in effigy, and placed on the effigy a placard declaring him a spy. Then they scattered around handbills on which was a tombstone, with a skullbone, bearing a poetic inscription that was by no means flattering, yet a fair sample of Greek society literature. The young man is a quiet and well-behaved fellow and poor, working his way through college, and so a legitimate object for the spite of a contemptible college secret society, the only excuse for whose existence is some such scoundrelism as the above.

PERSONAL MENTION.

—The Northern Pacific road has been bringing to the Cynosure office a nnmber of welcome visitors of late. The call of Bro. Simpson of Garfield, Washington Territory, has been noticed. He is on a journey of many weeks, intending to make a circuit of the whole country. Mr. W. N. Phillips, the father of our publisher, has just returned to Oregon after a very agreeable visit in this city and vicinity; and from the same region, Eugene City, Oregon, Bro. Aiken called on us last week. He represents, in a very intelligent manner, the power of the lodge in the churches, and tells also of some encouraging efforts by individuals to maintain a pure testimony for the Lord Jesus Christ.

—Dr. Harris Jenness of Bunker Hill, Indiana, a long-time reader of the Cynosure is for a short time in Chicago.

—Rev. E. B. Graham of the United Presbyterian church, Omaha, and author of "In the Coils," is, it seems, Prohibition candidate for regent of the State University, and is preparing to make a few addresses in the State. The New Republic well says: "He is a campaigner worth going out to hear. He makes it a rule never to make a speech unless he has something to say."

—Rev. J. P. Richards, of Belmont, Wis., who spent some time lecturing for the Minnesota association last summer has lately been on a visit to his old home in Hancock county in Illinois, and on returning to Wisconsin spent a few days in Chicago, brightening our office by the cheerfulness of his presence. Bro. Richards presided with dignity at the State convention at Monmouth last year.

NEW HAMPSHIRE NOTICE.

The ninth Annual Meeting of the N. H. Christian Association will be held in East Rochester, Oct. 27–8–9, to commence Tuesday evening at 7 o'clock. H. L. Hastings, editor of the Christian of Boston, Rev. H. F. Wood of Dover, Rev. Isaac Hyatt of Gilford Village, Rev. Enoch Morrill of Rochester, Dea. E. Smith of Strafford, and other earnest and pious men have been engaged to speak on various religious and reform topics of pressing interest. We look forward to a glorious gathering, with the Lord in our midst. Beloved brethren, fail not to embrace this favorable opportunity to do good and get good. We need to see each others' faces at least once a year, and to cheer each other on in this glorious war against sin and evil. Let constant prayer go up for a special blessing on this meeting.

THE FALLING OF THE APPLE.

As I stood in meditation
'Neath the orchard trees at night,
Where the moon and stars of autumn
Bathed the earth in pallid light,
Lo, the cricket hushed his music
At the dull, unwonted sound
Of the ripened mellow apple
Falling softly to the ground.

All the days of rain or sunshine,
Here had made their work complete,
Since the blossom dropped in spring-time
Till the fruit fell at my feet—
Loosened by the hand of Nature
With a touch that made no sound,
From the Father's hand of bounty
Falling softly to the ground.

Men have watched or men have slumbered,
Counted days, or laughed or wept,
But the upward flow of juices
God's great calendar have kept,
And the great machine of Nature
Onward moves without a sound,
Till we, startled, mark its fruitage
Falling softly to the ground.

Then my heart was dark and heavy
As I saw an iron hand
Moving in a sweep resistless
Through the air, and sea and land,
Ripening its plans gigantic,
Holding all things helpless, bound,
Till the full-grown curse or blessing
Falls as fruitage to the ground.

But the silver autumn splendor
Shone about my waiting feet,
Glistening on the golden fruitage
Sending up an odor sweet,
And I read a sweeter lesson
In the harvest spread around,
Of a God of patience ever
Show'ring blessings o'er the ground.

THE REVISED BIBLES.

Practically the two University Presses are supplying the whole English-speaking world with revised Bibles, and the work, it need hardly be said, has been a gigantic one. As regards Oxford, the manufacture of Bibles involves a great deal more than printing and binding. The Clarendon Press makes its own paper, casts its own type, does its own electrotyping, repairs its own machinery, makes its own ink, and even the materials of which the ink is made, are manufactured on the premises. It has a large book-binding establishment in Aldersgate street, London; and at Amen Corner, Paternoster Row, it does its own publishing.

The paper on which all the Oxford Bibles are printed is made at the University's own mill at Wolvercote. Oxford Bible paper is a specialty. There is a great deal of print in the Old and New Testaments, and unless great care were taken, the volumes would be thick and "podgy." The thinnest paper that can possibly be made opaque is the desideratum, and rags only are used at Wolvercote. Old sail cloths, being made of linen, are in great request here, and they enter into the composition more or less of all the paper used in Oxford Bibles. There are huge piles of this old material gathered in here after battling with breezes in all the seas under heaven. They come in here to be torn into shreds, and beaten into pulp, and bleached, drawn out into beautiful white sheets, to be presently printed on, wafted off again to all the ends of the earth—certainly rather a quaint and curious metamorphosis.

The paper made here, as we shall presently see, is not exclusively used for Bibles, but for this year's issue up to the present time more than 300 tons of paper have been turned out, and of this no less than 120 tons of a specially thin description have been consumed in the printing of the smallest sized edition. Altogether not less than about 450 tons of rags must have been consumed in manufacturing the necessary paper for the new Bibles. It has been reckoned that the paper would cover about two and a half square miles. Laid out in a strip six inches wide it would more than go round the world. The sheets piled up in reams as they come from the mill would make a column ten or twelve times the height of St. Paul's Cathedral; and if they were stacked up after folding into books, but without binding, the pile would tower to more than a hundred times the height of the cathedral. The completed copies turned out by Oxford alone, if piled up flat, one upon another, would make a pillar some seventeen miles high.—Leisure Hour.

SOLAR ENERGY.

Did the reader ever consider that next to the mystery of gravitation, which draws all things on the earth down, comes that mystery—not seen to be one because so familiar—of the occult force in the sunbeams which lifts things up? The incomprehensible energy of the sunbeams brought the carbon out of the air, put it together in the weed or the plant, and lifted each tree-trunk from the soil. The soil did not lift it, any more than the soil in Broadway lifted the spire of Trinity. Men brought stones there in wagons to build the church, and the sun brought the materials in its own way, and built up alike the slender shaft that sustains the grass blade and the column of pine. If the tree or the spire fell, it would require a certain amount of work of men or horses or engines to set it up again. So much actual work at least the sun did in the original building; and if we consider the number of trees in the forest, we see that this alone is something great. But besides this, the sun locked up in each tree a store of energy thousands of times greater than that which was spent in merely lifting the trunk from the ground, as we may see by unlocking it again, when we burn the tree under the boiler of an engine; for it will develop a power equal to the lifting of thousands of its kind, if we choose to employ it in this way. This is so true, that the tree may fall, and turn to coal in the soil, and still keep this energy imprisoned in it,—keep it for millions of years, till the black lump under the furnace gives out, in the whirling spindles of the factory or the turning wheel of the steam-boat, the energy gathered in the sunshine of the primeval world.

The most active rays in building up plant-life are said to be the yellow and orange, though nature's fondness for green everywhere is probably justified by some special utility. At any rate, the action of these solar rays is to decompose the products of combustion, to set free the oxygen, and to fix the carbon in the plant. Perhaps these words do not convey a definite meaning to the reader, but it is to be hoped they will, for the statement they imply is wonderful enough. Swift's philosopher at Laputa, who had a project for extracting sunbeams out of cucumbers, was wiser than his author knew; for cucumbers, like other vegetables, are found to be really in large part put together by sunbeams, and sunbeams, or what is scarcely distinguishable from such, could with our present scientific knowledge be extracted from cucumbers again, only the process would be too expensive to pay. The sunbeam, however, does what our wisest chemistry cannot do: it takes the burned-out ashes and makes them into green wood again; it takes the close and breathed-out air and makes it sweet and fit to breathe, by means of the plant, whose food is the same as our poison. With the aid of sunlight a lily would thrive on the deadly atmosphere of the "black-hole of Calcutta;" for this bane to us, we repeat, is vital air to the plant, which breathes it in through all its pores, bringing it into contact with the chlorophyl, its green blood, which is to it what the red blood is to us; doing almost everything, however, by the means of the sun ray; for if this is lacking, the oxygen is no longer set free or the carbon retained, and the plant dies. This too brief statement must answer instead of a fuller description of how the sun's energy builds up the vegetable world.

But the ox, the sheep, and the lamb feed on the vegetable, and we in turn on them (and on vegetables too); so that although we might eat our meals in darkness and still live, the meals themselves are provided literally at the sun's expense, virtue having gone out of him to furnish each morsel we put in our mouths. But while he thus prepares the material for our own bodies, and while it is plain that without him we could not exist any more than the plant, the processes by which he acts grow more intricate and obsure in our own higher organism, so that science as yet only half guesses how the sun makes us. But the making is done in some way by the sun, and so almost exclusively is every process of life.

It is not generally understood, I think, how literally true this is of every object in the organic world. In a subsequent illustration we shall see a newspaper being printed by power directly and visibly derived from the sunbeam. But all the power derived from coal, and all the power derived from human muscles, comes originally from the sun, in just as literal a sense: for the paper on which the reader's eye rests was not only made primarily from material grown by the sun, but was stitched together by derived sun-power, and by this also, each page was printed, so that the amount of this solar radiation expended for printing each number of this magazine could be stated with aproximate accuracy in figures. To make even the reader's hand which holds this page, or the eye which sees it, energy again went out from the sun; and in saying this I am to be understood in the plain and common meaning of the words. —Prof. Langley in the Century.

A SUNKEN CONTINENT IN THE PACIFIC.

The fact is quite generally conceded among scientists that the probabilities are strongly in favor of the supposition that there formerly existed a large island, of continental dimensions, between the West Indes and the western coast of Africa. This continent is supposed to be the "Atlantis" of the ancients, whose recent discoveries point to the further probability that there also once existed a similar continental area of land in the Pacific ocean, between the west coast of South America and the present Australian continent, as it is sometimes called.

At a recent meeting of the Academy of Sciences of San Francisco, Captain Churchill read a very interesting paper in relation to this matter. His paper referred especially to the gigantic sculptured figures still to be seen upon Easter Island, and evidently the work of a different race from that which now inhabits the island, and one much more numerous, since the works referred to are on too large a scale to have been constructed except by many hands. He argued what a vast continent once existed where there is now nothing but a waste ocean, dotted with countless isles and islets of varying size and character, the majority showing in their formation the traces of that former volcanic action which either uheaved them from the depths of the sea or shattered and sunk the continent of which they are now the only vestige. Easter Island, it is believed, was once the home of a population numbering many thousands, of whom scarcely any now remain. Besides dwelling on the sculptured figures to be found there, Captain Churchill laid much stress upon the hieroglyphic tablets of wood discovered upon Easter Island, and which are the only instance of a written language in Oceanica. He thought sufficient attention had not been given them.

From other sources we learn that a German government vessel recently visited that island, and made a large collection of pre-historic remains, and made copious notes of other matters of scientific interest. The German government, it is understood, is making preparations to send another expedition to Easter Island with a corps of scientists and engineers to sketch the island, surveying the ground, and to make plans and sections of the pre-historic buildings and ruins.

Our own government has also taken steps to secure some of these valuable remains representing the pre-historic and known races of this hemisphere. Instructions have already been sent to Admiral Upshur, incommand of the South Pacific squadron, to sed one of his vessels on a cruise in the direction of Easter Island, and to make such explorations, collections, and reports as he may think important in the interests of his government. The government of France is also turning its attention to this island, with the view to the establishment of a protectorate.

It is reported in the accounts given by the German vessel that the island, which is small, is strewn with large stone images and sculptured tablets. The inhabitants of the island know nothing about the remains, and even tradition gives no account of people living there when their ancestors arrived.—The Jewelers' Journal.

The Garden of the Ancient World.—The Babylonia of the present day resembles a desert, out of which arise mounds and ruins, solitary and grave; nearly all the canals are choked with sand; the shepherds wandering alone, with their flocks nibbling the spare grass, are almost the only human dwellers over the whole plateau. How different was it in the olden times. Between B. C. 2000 and 500 Babylonia was the garden of the ancient world. The land, surrounded like an island by two of the finest streams in the world, the Euphrates and Tigris—the rivers of Paradise—is truly the gift of both. They flowed with swift current from the Armenian highlands to the sea now known as the Persian gulf. In the course of centuries large masses of loam were rolled down and heaped at their original mouths, and this is what we now call Babylonia. It was on this soaked, fat and fertile soil that the oldest authentic and civilization, not of Asia merely, but of the world, developed itself. The melting of the Armenian snows caused inundations which had to be checked by damming the river with dykes and walls. Canals served for navigation and also led off the superfluous waters to parts unaffected by the overflow, and developed to such a degree their fertility that wheat and barley often gave the laborer 200 or 300 fold. Near Bagdad the two rivers are so near that only six hours are required to pass from one to the other. On this tongue of land, which was once a fourth narrower (for the Euphrates has since removed its bed further westward), the great canal system commenced, and by means of still smaller arteries the life-giving waters were distributed to nearly every tree. The distance between Bagdad and Hills (a three day's ride) was formerly strewed with the ruins of towns and villages. To its south, in the very heart of the land, lay Babylon, "the gate of God."

THE ROOTS OF THE ROSES.

The leaves are fading and falling,
The winds are rough and wild,
The birds have ceased their calling,
But let me tell you, my child,

Though day by day, as it closes,
Doth darker and colder grow,
The roots of the bright red roses
Will keep alive in the snow.

And when the winter is over,
The boughs will get new leaves,
The quail come back to the clover,
The swallow back to the eaves;

The robin will wear on his bosom
The vest that is bright and new,
And the liveliest wayside blossom
Will shine with sun and dew.

So, when some dear joy loses
Its beauteous summer glow,
Think how the roots of the roses
Are kept alive in the snow.

PERFECT FAITH.

A story is told of a street boy in London who had both his legs broken by a dray passing over them. He was laid away in one of the hospitals to die, and another little creature of the same class was laid near by, picked up sick with famine fever. The latter was allowed to lie down by the side of the little crushed boy. He crept up to him and said:

"Bobby, did you never hear about Jesus?"

"No, I never heard of him."

"Bobby, I went to mission school once, and they told us that Jesus would take you to heaven when you die, and you'd never hunger any more, and have no more pain, if you axed him."

"I couldn't ask such a big gentleman as he is to do any thing for me. He wouldn't even stop to speak to a boy like me."

"But he'll do all that if you ax him."

"How can I ax him if I don't know where he lives, and how can I get there when both my legs are broke?"

"Bobby, they told me at mission school as how Jesus passes by. Teacher says he goes around. How do you know but that he might come around to this hospital this very night? You'd know him if you was to see him."

"But I can't keep my eyes open. My legs feel so awful bad. Doctor says I'll die."

"Bobby hold up your hand, and he'll know what you want when he passes by."

They got the hand up. It dropped. Tried again. It slowly fell back. Three times he got up the little hand, only to let it fall. Bursting into tears, he said:

"I give it up."

"Bobby, lend me your hand; put your elbow on my pillar; I can do without it."

So one hand was propped up. And when they came in the morning, the boy lay dead, his hand still held up for Jesus. You may search the world and you cannot find a grander illustration of simple trust than that of the little boy who had been to mission school but once.—Selected.

NOVEL-KILLED.

Some years ago a young lady began to visit her pastor's study as a religious inquirer. It was during a revival, and on every hand her young friends were coming to Christ. But there she stood at the very threshold of the kingdom, wistfully looking over, as if her feet were chained. She made no advance. Her pastor and her friends were equally puzzled. Prayer was offered for her, and the plainest instructions given; but she remained unmoved, excepting to regret that she could not become a Christian. At last, after three months' labor and anxiety, her pastor said, "I can do nothing with Sophia L——; she is perfectly unmanageable. I doubt if she will ever yield to the claims of the Gospel."

"What is the trouble? Can you not discover the obstacle in her way?" was asked.

"I find she is an inveterate novel reader, and I have come to the conclusion that this will keep her out of the kingdom."

"Can she not be persuaded to give up her novels?"

"That is not the point entirely. She has wasted her sensibilities over unreal objects so long—so continually reversed right and wrong, looking at vice in the garb of virtue, and of virtue in that of unworthiness and injustice that she has destroyed her moral sense. She assents to truth, but seems to have no power to grasp it; she knows what is right, but has no energy of will to do it. Her mind is diseased and enervated, and I fear hopelessly so."

When we look at the young people daily flocking to the public libraries for the latest novels, or see them lounging away their best hours over the story-papers and the magazines, when we hear of this one or that one who "does nothing but read novels the whole day through," we think of Sophia L——, who is "perfectly unmanageable" on points of truth and duty, and wonder if they too must be given over to mental and moral disease and death.

"Not long ago I found a lad in an inquiry room. I spoke to him, and found, to my surprise, a degree of cold indifference to the subject of religion not often found in the young. He had come in with a school-fellow friend of his, who wanted to speak with me. He avowed himself as being a disbeliever in the Bible. I, amazed at this infidelity in one so young, asked him on what grounds he disbelieved the Bible. He replied, without a moment's hesitation, that 'the scientific difficulties in the book of Genesis made it impossible to believe the Bible was true.' Probing the infidelity of this lad of fourteen, I found that his teacher in the public school where he attended was a disciple of Herbert Spencer, and that he had managed to instil his skepticism into the minds of his pupils. Moreover the lad had an elder brother in the Scientific School at Yale College, and he alleged the opinions of one of the leading professors who was an atheist. In addition, I found that the boy backed up his infidelity by naming a large number of the prominent educators of the youth of our land as being among those who did not believe in the divine authority of the Bible. He evidently had been filled by his teacher. We hope that such cases are rare among teachers and pupils; but we fear at the same time that they are not so exceptional as we could wish. Thus does this kind of infidelity silently percolate from the higher down through the lower and younger classes."—Pentecost.

TEMPERANCE.

GENERAL GRANT'S USE OF LIQUOR.

So much has been written about General Grant's intemperate habits, both in Galena, before the war, during the struggle, at the White House, and especially during his trip around the country, that the following from Admiral Ammen's "Recollections and Letters of Grant" in the last North American Review should be put in evidence also:

"During all the years of his Presidency I was most kindly, I may say affectionately, received at the White House, and was there at such times as he had his recreations. His table was supplied with the wines usual with persons of position. During the earlier years of his administration he partook, but not at all freely, of what he furnished his guests. The winter preceding the expiration of his last term he was actually abstinent at his own table, and I have every reason to believe entirely so. Yet during that period one or more of the Washington Sunday newspapers, and other vile prints, informed the people of the disgrace they were suffering because of their besotted President, who was to be seen daily reeling through the streets! During all of these years I never saw General Grant in a condition that would give rise even to a suspicion that he had indulged too freely in liquors, and only on one occasion have I ever had a glass of liquor at the White House. On one of the many Sundays that General Grant invited me to walk before dinner, the weather was raw and the wind high. On coming into the house the General proposed a glass of liquor, and, going into the dining-room, we were waited on by the steward. Many of the friends and admirers of General Grant will read this statement with gratification and the more if they know me personally. They will at least feel assured that I would not present even a specious statement, much less an untruth, however much I might feel interested in the good name of any one. May not the gentlemen of the press well consider whether it would not be far better to do justice to the living than to adulate the dead? Adulation then cannot recompense the wronged, nor can 'flattery soothe the dull, cold ear of death.'"

SHERMAN AND GRANT.

The Rock Island Daily Argus contains an interview with Dr. Samuel Craig Plummer, a member of the medical department of the Army of the Mississippi, and one of the surgeons so cruelly maligned by Murat Halsted in his letter to Governor Chase in 1863. When spoken to upon the subject Dr. Plummer said: "I remember full well all the scenes and incidents of that memorable year. I was with Sherman long enough to understand him and his habits fully. I was medical inspector when Dr. Moore was medical director, and when he was transferred I was promoted to the medical directorship. This placed me in closer intimacy with General Sherman than I had ever been before, and having, as I had, the charge of all the liquors used for medicinal purposes, which were the best that could be obtained, I had every opportunity of knowing who were the inveterate drinkers. There never was a more sober lot of men than General Sherman, General Grant and their staff-officers. I know Dr. Kittoe, of Galena, and Dr. Rowler of Chicago, who took my place as medical inspector, and I never saw one of them under the influence of liquor in any particular. I never allowed a drop of liquor to pass my lips, nor did any of the other surgeons."

"Were Generals Grant and Sherman in the habit of being under the influence of intoxicants?"

"Never, sir. Being General Sherman's staff surgeon, I saw him almost constantly, and he seldom if ever touched a drop. He was particularly careful in this particular; and as for General Grant, I never saw him in the least intoxicated, and in fact never saw him even touch a drop until after the surrender of Vicksburg, when he drank a glass of wine on the flagship. We all knew the effects of overindulgence in liquor, especially at such a critical time, and none of our Generals, staff-officers, or members of the medical staff were given to intoxication or to drinking."

DEATH OF A NOTED MAN AND A LESSON.

While attending a meeting of Presbytery this week I had the opportunity also of attending the funeral of Hon. Edgar Cowan, of Greensburg. His age was seventy years, his disease cancer. It seated itself in the mouth, and he died very much as General Grant died but a few days before.

Mr. Cowan was elected United States Senator and took his seat at the same time that Lincoln was inaugurated President. These two gentlemen became very intimate, and during all the dark days of the Rebellion they worked together. A mutual friend stated to me that Cowan was one of Lincoln's confidential advisers. After the death of Lincoln, Cowan switched off from the Republican party in favor of the devious ways of that erratic gentleman, Andrew Johnson, and when articles of impeachment were preferred against Johnson, two honored sons of Franklin College locked horns over that impeachment—Hon. John A. Bingham was appointed by the House of Representatives to prosecute, and Cowan was the chief defender. Both these gentlemen had their bringing up in the Associate Reformed, now the United Presbyterian church. But politics seem to have an unfavorable influence on the religion of some men. It seemed to have been so in the case of the gentleman of whom I write.

Two things I mention as worthy of special notice. The disease of which Cowan died, he said, was induced by the use of tobacco.

Young man, take warning. Throw away that vile thing. This is the second distinguished victim lately of that same vice.

Then, to the credit of this gentleman I will only say farther, that neither Freemasonry, nor any other form of secrecy was ever countenanced by him. So much for the influence of early education.—G. C. Vincent in United Presbyterian.

Joseph Cook, in his recent temperance address at old Fort Ticonderoga, announced himself as having taken new ground against the traffic in strong drink since last May. He is ready to fight it now, tooth and nail, and to accept no compromise, nothing but unconditional surrender, no matter how long or hard the struggle may be. He has been led to this position by a careful observation of events and tendencies in the social, commercial and political world, and he urges his convictions with his usual sledge-hammer force, and his usual boldness.—The Standard.

The Churches.

—The Reformed Presbyterian church, with which for many years the late Rev. A. M. Milligan, D. D., held the closest and happiest relation as pastor, has called Rev. David Gregg, of the Third New York congregation to take up the work laid down by Dr. Milligan.

—The Philadelphia U. P. presbytery at its late meeting adopted the following on motion of Dr. J. B. Dales, pastor of the Second church:

Whereas, The subject of temperance has ever had a prominent place in the history and acts of the United Presbyterian church, and in the judgment of this Presbytery is worthy of special consideration at this time; therefore,

Resolved, That this Presbytery hails with joy the increasing attention to it in the public mind, and hereby most earnestly calls upon the people under our care to make special efforts by their prayers, by active co-operation, and, as opportunity may afford, at the ballot box to promote the immediate best interests of this great and momentous cause.

—Mr. Moody will hold meetings in New York in October in the church corner Broome and Centre streets.

—J. E. Gardner, son of Rev. N. E. Garduer of West Union, Iowa, lately entered Union Biblical Seminary, at Dayton, Ohio. He is described as a young man of excellent character and talents, and expects to take a complete theological course, with a view to active work in the ministry.

—The Oregon Oracle, of Philomath, Oregon, of the first inst., says: "Bishop Wright visited old friends and made many new ones during the few days he stayed with us. He preached a number of times in the tabernacle." Bishop Wright was connected with the United Brethren school at Philomath in its early history, many years ago.

—Rev. Dr. Samuel H. Kellogg of Pittsburgh has resigned his professorship in Biblical Literature in Western Theological Seminary, to accept the pastorate of the St. Johns Square Presbyterian church, Toronto. Dr. Kellogg was a missionary in India for about ten years.

—The Moravian missionaries among the aborigines of Australia say the "eventide" of their work is approaching. The blacks will soon be extinct. But in view of this fact, they increase their efforts that the departing race may know and trust in Christ.

—Rev. G. P. Hays, D. D., late of Denver, has at last consented to accept the call to the pastorate of the Second Presbyterian church, Cincinnati, and has removed to that city. He was one of the most popular of the moderators of the Presbyterian General Assembly.

—A new church was dedicated at Boyden, Iowa, on Sabbath, Oct. 11th., by Rev. Dr. Wm. Johnston, of College Springs. Another was to be dedicated by him on last Sabbath at Summerset, Iowa.

—The Rev. Robert Hardie of Mellette, Dakota, and president of the Dakota Wesleyan conference, is husband of the Mrs. Hardie who wrote the excellent little story, "A Woman's Victory," published by the N. C. A.

—The Evangelists Whittle and McGranahan were to have begun meetings in Lawrence, Oct. 7th, but the dangerous illness of Major Whittle's little daughter, in Northfield, Mass., has prevented, and the work is postponed for a time. The death of Major Whittle's little son last spring arouses for him a deeper sympathy in the present trial, and there are many prayers for the recovery of this child.

—Rev. W. J. Reid, D. D., pastor of the First United Presbyterian church, Pittsburgh, has resumed his position as teacher of the Sabbath-school Teacher's Saturday Bible-class, held in the Y. M. C. A. rooms, Pittsburgh. He is expected to conduct the class during the winter.

—An excellent evidence of the genuineness of the recent missionary revival in England is furnished by the following item: In connection with the Church Missionary Society, 105 young men have offered themselves for mission work during the past year, of whom forty-five have been accepted, more than half as many again as last year. Of these, eighteen go direct to the mission field, eight of the number being university graduates; two go out entirely at their own charges.

—Statistics of 1884 are said to prove that there are 76,960 evangelical preachers in the United States, 126,109 congregations, and 10,561,648 communicants. Of miscellaneous sects there are 38,791 preachers, 10,763 congregations, and 7,169,655 adherents. If each member of an evangelical church represents two even, including children, who are adherents, the evangelical population amounts to 31,684,944. On the other hand, the Romanists claim 6,905 priests, 7,663 congregations, and 6,800,000 souls, constituting the entire population adhering to Rome.

—Rev. Daniel Irving, Secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian church, died in Orange, N. J., Monday, aged 64 years.

—Temperance resolutions were discussed in an animated manner by the late Wisconsin Methodist Episcopal Conference at Waukesha, the scene at times being boisterous. Finally the body adopted a strict prohibition manifesto, with the proviso that the political doings of members should not be taken as the action of the entire conference. The sale or use of tobacco was also unequivocally condemned.

—The eighth anniversary of the Chicago Pacific Garden Mission was observed Thursday night at the mission rooms, corner of Van Buren street and Fourth avenue. The mission was founded by Col. George R. Clark in October, 1877, at No. 365 South Clark street, in what was formerly known as the Pacific Garden. The next year it was moved to a larger room at the corner of Van Buren and Clark streets, and about two years ago was transferred to the present spacious rooms, formerly one of the lowest beer gardens in the city. The work has been very successful from the first. A large choir furnished the music, over a hundred converts testified to their reformation, and Colonel Clark, the Rev. Dr. Goodwin, and A. M. Delight made brief addresses.

—The Chicago Sabbath Committee held their annual meeting at the office of Colonel R. B. Mason, Thursday afternoon. The members gave expression to their appreciation of the gratifying results so far accomplished. This committee endeavors to promote Sabbath observance, chiefly by laboring for the elevation of public sentiment concerning it. Action was taken authorizing a committee of five to make arrangements for mass-meetings in behalf of Sunday observance, to be held at American, Germau and Scandinavian churches.

—The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions met in Tremont Temple, Boston, last week. Mark Hopkins, D. D., was re-elected president, having served in that capacity for twenty-seven years. The receipts for the year from churches, individuals, Sabbath-schools, etc., amount to $241,914, a decrease of $1,919; from the Womeu's Boards, $145,098, a decrease of $3,932; but in the total revenue of $517,593 there has been an increase of $121. The missionary force is about 2,600, and the additions to the mission churches is 3,000 on confession of faith. Charges were made by Rev. Leonard W. Bacon of perversion of the funds of the Board. An examination did not sustain them, but a committee was appointed to investigate the finances of the Board.

—The Edict of Nantes was revoked 200 years ago and the event is to be celebrated by French Protestants on October 18th, with a great effort to extend evangelical Christianity in France.

—The Rev. Dr. G. L. McKay, the missionary of the Canadian Presbyterians in the island of Formoso, has returned to the field from which he was driven out by the French during their invasion. He was welcomed by thousands, and found that all the converts had remained firm. He has ordained two as native pastors and wishes no more English missionaries sent, leaving the work henceforth to the native ministry.

—The Evangelical Association, a body of Methodistic character, and originally German in nationality with its headquarters at Cleveland, Ohio, reports twenty-six annual conferences, four of which are not in the United States. Of the four, one is in Canada, one in Japan, one in Germany, and a fourth in Switzerland. The number of communicants is 128,634, showing a net increase for the year of 4,080. There were 14,508 converts gathered in besides those received by letter. Nearly 1,400 died, 750 were expelled and 2,797 withdrew. There are 1,053 itinerant and 588 local preachers, showing a decrease in the latter class of thirty-four. The number of churches is 1,728, and their value is $3,939,799. It is noticeable that while only 1,888 adults were baptized, no fewer than 8,717 children received the ordinance.

—The 350th anniversary of the Reformation was celebrated in Geneva on the 23d of August, at which time Calvin and Farel were recognized by having two streets named for them. There were speeches and many sermons on the Sabbath, and a tablet was placed in the wall of St. Peter's Cathedral, the inscription upon which testified to the immovable attachment of the Genevese Protestants to the Reformed religion. This is all very well. But when one is in Geneva he is compelled to feel that the spirit of Calvin and Farel are there no longer. It is a city given up to worldliness—full, also, of scepticism and open infidelity—with but little to show, except in historic memorials, that it was once the center of religious thought and liberty for the world. —United Presbyterian.

—The Rev. P. M. Rudra, of North India, says, as the result of a tour in South India: "From what I have seen and heard, the prospects of Christianity in South India are so encouraging as to lead me to hope that in no very distant time the whole country will be brought to the feet of Jesus."

—Mr. Spurgeon, presiding lately at a religious service held in the Metropolitan Tabernacle, observed in the course of the proceedings that there were so many agencies, societies, etc., connected with that church that were each Monday evening to be devoted to any one in particular, a year would not be sufficient to get through them all. There were some fifty-four such agencies. He wished there were sixty-four, and if they possessed that number he should probably wish it increased to 104, such being the case, he desired as much help as possible with regard to Sunday schools and other church agencies.

MISSIONARIES FOR AFRICA.

In the Earnest Christian, Rochester, New York, Rev. B. T. Roberts tells of the departure of more consecrated workers for the great mission fields of Africa:

"Three more missionaries of the Lord Jesus, Bro. and sister Noyes, of Michigan, and sister Mary Carpenter, sister of one of our teachers at North Chili, have started for Africa. They sailed on Saturday, September 12, on the bark, Monrovia, for Liberia, on the West coast, near the equator. With brother Noyes we have but little acquaintance, but he bears the reputation of being a man of God. He is well-informed, a good preacher, a practical farmer of sound sense, and ready to adapt himself to circumstances. It is expected that he will go to King Tappa, whose call for a missionary helped to stir us up as a people to aid in sending the Gospel to the benighted millions of Africa. Sister Carpenter is a young woman of good education, sound sense, solid judgment and deep piety. She goes to assist sister Sharp in her school and in other missionary labors at Monrovia, Liberia. They all feel called of God for the sacrifices they have made and the labors they have undertaken. There were not sufficient funds in the treasury to pay their passage and purchase their outfit, but as a vessel sails from New York direct to Liberia only about once a year, and as their fare this way would only be one hundred dollars each, and two or three times that amount by way of England, the Board felt warranted in borrowing enough to make up the amount needed."

PROGRESS OF THE M'ALL MISSION.

Few schemes of evangelical effort have begun more quietly, grown more rapidly, or attracted more attention and sympathy than what is known as the McAll Mission in France. Less than fourteen years ago Mr. McAll and his wife entered Paris as strangers, hoping to find some opportunity of doing a little for the moral and religious welfare of the thousands in that gay French capital who live with little thought of Christ or his claims upon them. It was an humble beginning, but it has grown to be a great influence. The two workers have raised up other workers by the score in Paris and at the stations outside of Paris, and every year the circle of influence is widening. The little room in which the first services were held has given place to three central mission houses, called the Philadelphia, New York and Baltimore Salles. Around these are other salles —the Salle Boston in Montmartre, the Salles Washington and Cleveland, three salles supported by friends in Brooklyn, the Grenelle Salle sustained by the American Episcopal chapel in Paris, Salle Beach, recently opened near the Arc de Triomphe, and a whole series of remoter stations. Strong friends have been made in this country for this mission effort, and last year nearly $36,000 was raised for the work; and this year the amount will undoubtedly be increased.

The opportunities for extension are boundless. The only restriction is in funds. Every new station opened is welcomed by thoughtful persons who say: "This is what we have been waiting and longing for. These teachings meet our deepest needs." The audiences invariably listen closely to a searching and thorough presentation of the truth; and those speakers who keep most closely to the essential truths and extend the direct and loving appeals of the Gospel are most heartily welcomed, says Mr. McAll, and most eagerly listened to. The funds all go for rents and necessary expenses. Mr. McAll himself takes no part of them for his personal use, and his assistants get only a small stipend. Many earnest women in Paris give their time freely in work for the Mission, acting as doorkeepers, supplying books, conducting meetings, and helping in the singing.—Independent.

LODGE NOTES.

—It is reported in lodge journals that President Cleveland is a member of the Knights of Pythias.

—There are said to be 16,698 Masons in Wisconsin.

—The Royal Arch Grand Chapter of Washington Territory has declared that "traffic in intoxicating liquors is a Masonic offence." Every honest man knew that it was a crime against God and man generations ago. We are glad the lodge is learning, though late.

—The Grand Lodge of Scotland has been granting a charter for a lodge at Nagaski, Japan.

—The Detroit Freemason is responsible for the following: "There are 134,801 Royal Arch Masons in this country. They are not as strong as they were in the time of Judah, Ephraim, Reuben and Dan. They had four divisions with three tribes in each numbering 150,000, making in all 600,000 fighting men of war.

—A Milwaukee special to the Chicago Times says: The original trouble between the Patriarchal Circle and the Odd-fellows has developed into a wider breach than ever since the recent meeting of the Sovereign Grand Lodge in Baltimore. The Circle was organized in Milwaukee several years ago, and now has a membership of over four thousand, being especially strong in Illinois and Ohio. The Circle was never looked upon with favor by the Sovereign Grand Lodge, although every effort was made to placate that body. The Grand Lodge, at its recent session, refused to recognize the Circle. A special meeting of the Supreme temple of the Circle will be called to meet in Chicago Nov. 10th, when steps will be taken to establish the order as an independent organization. A prominent member of the Circle said to-day: "As the Sovereign Grand Lodge refuses to recognize us, the Circle hereafter will be an independent order. This will affect us little. We have as fine a ritual as any order in existence, a splendid insurance system, and pay liberal weekly benefits. The Circle, however, has been from the first a benefit to Odd fellowship, as members have first to become Odd-fellows. The members almost to a man are enthusiastic in maintaining the order on an independent basis in the future."

—The Illinois Grand Lodge of colored Masons were meeting in Springfield last week and had an exciting time. Quite a heated discussion transpired over the recognition of some of the members of the Grand Lodge of Iowa who were present visitors. John G. Jones, of Chicago, declared that he would not set in the Grand lodge at its present session unless Austin C. Bland and others of the Iowa Masons withdrew from the hall. Jones denounced the Grand Lodge of Iowa in a bitter speech and withdrew from the session, declaring he should never again be assocated with it.

AN INIMITABLE SUMMER RESORT.

The largest majority of health or pleasure-seeking tourists that have not the requisite time and wealth to visit the mountain resorts of Colorado or the cool lake retreats of Northern Wisconsin and Minnesota, long for a resort that will combine the benefits of easy access, pure air and enough natural attraction to entertain and invigorate the spirit. Origon, Ogle county, Illinois, possesses the combination in the greatest degree: On the Burlington route, but 99 miles from Chicago, and reached from that point twice per day in less than four hours, with good and ample hostelries; numbers of springs gushing forth pure and health-giving water; the beautiful Rock river; towering hills and massive rocks, one can well imagine that all the popular and interesting resorts of the continent have been merged together to be enjoyed at this delightful place. FARM NOTES.

Poultry should have plenty of light, and be kept warm in cold weather.

It is stated that there are 75 full blooded Holstein cattle within the near vicinity of Elgin, and more in Illinois than any other State in the Union.

California farmers raise sixty-two bushels of sunflower seed to the acre, and after grinding a gallon of oil from each bushel feed the refuse to the chickens and cows.

A farmer in Maine recommends in the Home Farm sprinkling air-slacked lime on potatoes, when being stored in the cellar, to prevent rotting. It is a cheap remedy and worthy of a trial, as it can do no injury.

Celery growing is very profitable in localities where there is a market. A family that would go into its culture would make a good part of their living off it. Near one of the large cities a few years ago, there was what was thought to be an irredeemable swamp. There were several acres in it. But one day a genius bought it for a song, a mere trifle. He drained it and went into the celery culture—that alone. In a few years he had made a comfortable fortune. The acres of hopeless swamp clear many thousand dollars every year. The heavy, stiff soil is of unknown depth almost, and it was just what celery needs.

Evaporating fruit is a growing industry. One machine turns out from seventy five to 100 bushels per day. A Jersey man says the profit on 100 baskets of peaches is $30. Black and red raspberries, strawberries, blackberries cherries, grapes, sweet corn, potatoes, beans, and pumpkins, are also evaporated. Cabbage and celery are bleached to a crispy white. The latest notion is evaporating finely chopped vegetables to be used in soups.

Neglected fence corners soon become worse than unsightly. As the weeds multiply and the roots of the bushes gain strength, these intruders crowd into the field, and in a large farm the aggregate of land thus occupied is a serious matter. Besides, these angles are nurseries for seeds of pestilent growths, which are distributed all over the field. Even when fences are straight and light, like board or wire fences for example, these dangerous corners exist. After long possession, sprouts and bushes are hard to eradicate. Sometimes it will pay to move the fence to get a clean sweep at them. But they must be outrooted if once established, and the sooner the better. When the fence corners are once clean—keep them clean.

Vick's Magazine says if one would have a good garden it should be free from foul weeds. Nine out of ten of the gardens among farmers are allowed to mature a crop of weeds the latter part of the season and usually. This is the result of carelessness. After June or when such early crops as peas, lettuce, and radishes have matured, no further use is made of the land, and, as it has usually matured in the spring, it grows a lusty crop of weeds and fills the soil so full of seeds as to quadruple the work of cultivation of such plants as come up delicately, and which must be kept clean by hand. The evil of ripening a crop of weed seeds is not short-lived, for the seeds will remain in the soil for many years, and germinate when the spring opens.

Says the Germantown Telegraph: There are probably few farmers who have not been perplexed, not to say provoked, at their failure to grow squashes. The young plant will start well, grow luxuriently for a time and then begin to show signs of decay. In most cases this appears to result from the ravages of a sort of maggot or insect that works at the surface of the ground, as effectual in causing destruction. We notice in an exchange what is claimed to be a remedy, which is so simple that it is worthy of trial at least. The writer says: "I put a handful of salt in each hill at the time of planting and not a vine was touched. They grew splendidly, and the squashes kept well through the winter. One hill was planted without salt, and that proved a failure." Farmers will do well to bear the above in mind at the time of planting squashes. Application of salt after planting will probably do just as well.

Chicks for Market.—If you are raising chickens to sell for market purposes, sell off the young roosters as fast as they get fit to kill, says a poultry fancier. The flock will be more quiet and grow better, and from this time out the price will be growing less. Put the old hens in market as soon as they stop laying, and before the pin-feathers start.

Chicken Cholera.—The Stockman says, that when cholera is said to be in a neighborhood, poultry keepers should watch their stock closely and remove sick birds, when first discovered. The feeding grounds and houses, should then be sprinkled with a disinfectant made by putting eight ounces of sulphuric acid in eight gallons of water. In old, infected houses the liquid must be used so as to saturate all the wood work and the ground where the fowls run. The remedy is comparatively inexpensive, and if promptly used as a preventive, will prove a good investment.

A Wonderful Woman, A Wonderful Life, AND A Wonderful Book.

Laura S. Haviland is a quiet, gentle, unassuming Quaker woman, 76 years of age, yet vigorous, who has had a remarkable career of usefulness, and has now given to the world a remarkable history of her "Life Work" as a teacher, at an early day, of the colored refugees in Canada and in Michigan, and in other States, as a traveler down South in the guise of a "berry picker," helping out into freedom many slaves; as a nurse and preacher to the sufferers in hospitals during the war; and with Gov. St. John and Elizabeth Comstock, relieving the destitute and suffering refugees in Kansas, etc.

Her book is neither fiction nor founded on fiction, but is an interesting narration of facts of a most thrilling character, as every one will find and testify who will get and read her book, now on sale at the Cynosure office, 221 W. Madison St., Chicago, Ill. Price, cloth, $1,75; half Russia, $2.25.

IN BRIEF.

The average income of the 509 lords of England is $120,000 each. Their gross income is over $75,000,000.

The "Big Woods" of Minnesota well deserve the name, for they cover 5,000 square miles, or 3,000,000 acres of sur face.

Mr. S. P. Dennis of New York city, has invented and brought into a condition for practical usefulness an autographic telegraph instrument by which it is possible to send fac-simile copies of messages from place to place.

A new species of bear has been discovered on Mount Shasta which is found in no other part of the world. It is about the size of a shepherd dog, is white and very ferocious. Three have been killed lately.

According to a decision of the Iowa Supreme Court, a hotel-keeper who receives guests while knowing that there is a contagious disease in his house is liable for damages to any guest who may contract the disease.

A resident of Reading, Pa., on July 9, in housing wheat accidentally covered up a chicken in the grain. It was taken out last week and was found alive, after an imprisonment of 73 days.

A tender-hearted mother in Athens, Ga., has brought up a large family without ever subjecting one of its members to the discipline of the slipper or the rod. The only punishment was a dose of castor oil and rhubarb.

Miss Belle Franklin, a Dakota schoolteacher, saved a neighbor's wheat stacks and house from a prairie fire by harnessing the horses to the plow and turning several furrows, which created a substantial fire-brake.

Mrs. Cameron, wife of ex-Senator Angus Cameron of Wisconsin, is thought to be fatally ill, resulting from an injury to her spine, received in a collision between two ferry-boats at the Brooklyn and New York ferry last April.

An anthropological congress which is soon to be held at Rome, will have a curious feature in a collection of 700 skulls of criminals, numbered and classified. To these will be added the photographs of 3,000 and the brains of more than 150 convicts, thousands of autographs, poems, and special instruments, the work of criminals.

Col. Donn Piatt charges in a newspaper interview that there is no such thing as honest jury service in Cincinnati. He says that the paneling of a jury in Hamilton county is simply packing a jury, and he adds that the heirs in the Kirby will case—he being one—paid $50,000 to get away from a packed jury. Under the circumstances it is not surprising that the Cincinnatians burned their courthouse and killed a hundred people by the lurid flames thereof.—N. Y. World.

Fifteen years since, the British parliament in order to encourage the ownership of land by small proprietors, agreed to loan to the purchaser two-thirds of the purchase money. Four years since, they improved the Irish land act by increasing the amount of the loan to three-fourths of the value of the property to be bought. The new Tory government, desiring to out-do the Liberals in liberalism, proposed to advance a sum sufficient to purchase the land. Under the two former acts only 1,500 Irish peasants became proprietors of small holdings; under the proposed act, the proprietors will probably be counted by hundreds of thousands. Henry George has been accused of holding very absurd theories, but if we mistake not, this nationalization of the land is after all the practical result at which he aimed. —The Critic, Halifax, N. S.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

WASHINGTON.

Reports received at the Marine Hospital Bureau show that yellow fever is epidemic in Caracas; that cholera is decreasing in Spain and is extinguished in Valencia; that small pox is raging in Buenos Ayres with alarming fatality, and the yellow fever has appeared in Acapulco.

Emanuel De Campo, an attache of the Chilian legation, was arrested last Thursday for being drunk. When brought into the station he exhibited his passport and was released. This is the third time he has been arrested. He was very abusive and demanded that Secretary Bayard be brought right around to the station to [illegible] him.

Twenty bridal couples are sojourning at present at the Ebbitt House. They come from all parts of the United States. It used to be that bridal couples went to Niagara, but of late years they seem to prefer Washington.

There are indications, say some of the Republican papers, that Attorney General Garland will not long remain a member of the Cabinet. While he has not resigned and has not been requested to do so, his relations with the President are at present somewhat strained, to use a diplomatic phrase.

COUNTRY.

The Chicago Exposition closed Saturday after one of its most successful seasons.

At the convent of St. Joseph, near St. Louis, Thursday evening three young ladies assumed the vows of the order and retired from the world. One of the postulants was Miss Maggie Montgomery, daughter of the late Hon. Zachariah Montgomery, Assistant Attorney General of the United States.

In investigating the Comptorller's office at New York Wednesday, the State Senate Committee discovered that heavy balances had been kept in the defunct Marine Bank; that money had been withdrawn from another bank and placed with the marine; and that Ferdinand Ward had requested the Chamberlain, or Comptroller, to make the city's deposit in the Marine Bank, at certain times, as large as possible. A letter from Ward requesting a special deposite of bonds, was also unearthed, the favor being asked two days before the great failure, at which time the city's funds in the Marine Bank reached $1,300,000.

Natural gas was found in Massillon, O., Friday at a depth of 560 feet. The strike was entirely unexpected, as the drill entered the vein, and the gas came from the well with a shrill, whistling noise. It was ignited from a stove in the tool room, and sent a flame of fire about twenty-five feet into the derrick, which was soon burned to the ground. Considerable excitement prevails throughout the city, and large parties of citizens visit the well hourly.

A natural gas well, the second largest in size in the country, was "struck" near Canonsburg, Pa., Monday evening. The use of natural gas for domestic and manufactoring purposes at Pittsburg has displaced from 8,000 to 10,000 tons of coal daily.

A rock on the track precipitated the engine, baggage cars, and smoker of a Baltimore and Ohio train into the river near Pyle Falls, Pa., early Tuesday morning. Several persons were scalded and bruised, none fatally.

The Troy and Boston railroad bridge near North Hoosac, N. Y., was burned Thursday, two firemen of North Bennington, Vt., being killed by falling timbers. O. F. Coy, a North Bennington merchant, was fatally injured.

The output of flour at Minneapolis last week reached 171,105 barrels—42 barrels in excess of the previous week's production, which was the greatest on record. The market is unchanged, but millers hold tenaciously to their figures.

There are 100 cases of dyptheria and typhoid fever at Kittanning, Pa., and fifteen deaths from these diseases have occurred within ten days. In many instances whole families are stricken down.

An explosion in the Cherry Valley furnace, near Leetonia, Ohio, Tuesday, dashed several tons of molten metal over four men, one of whom was burnt beyond recognition. The others will probably recover.

The house and barn of Peter Henger, living near Ithaca, Neb., were burned Thursday night. Henger's wife and child and his brother perishing in the flames. Sensational rumors are afloat that young Henger murdered his sister-in-law and her child, and then, before killing himself, fired the premises.

Contractor Ferguson, of Pennsylvania railway, who had been held prisoner for a week by Hungarian and Italian laborers near Gallitzen because he could not pay wages, was released Friday. At one time his jailers had prepared a rope to hang him.

John and William Kester, brothers, aged 50 and 54 years, residing at Seybertsville, Pa., refused Thursday night to give up their money to tramps who invaded their premises. The vagrants then bound the brothers, beat out their brains with clubs, and decamped.

In Franklin county, Georgia, the illicit distillers have assassinated one man and attempted the life of another. Notice has been served upon persons who have given information to the government to to leave the county.

Quiet prevailed at St. Louis early last week, and but few street cars were running. The Mayor said that he had exhausted his powers. The street railway people say they want no arbitration and absolutely refuse to recognize the Knights of Labor.

FOREIGN.

For the week ended Oct. 9 the deaths from small-pox at Montreal numbered 280, 263 of whom were French-Canadians. Fifty-four new cases and forty-one deaths were reported Tuesday.

Judge Taschereau has decided that the board of health is legally constituted; that the city is rightfully in possession of the Mount Royal hospital, and that magistrates and justices of the peace can convict for violations of the health laws. The French are furious with rage at the decisions, and it is feared that the exhibition buildings will be mobbed again.

The Italian government has received advices confirming the report of the death of Osman Digna. Four hundred Abyssinians, who were wounded in the recent fight with Osmau's followers, are camped at Ahmara. The march of the Abyssinians to Kassala has been checked.

The conference of ambassadors at Constantinople Wednesday considered the violation of the Berlin treaty by the union of Roumelia and Bulgaria. It was rumored in London that King Milan, of Servia, informed the powers that he must either abdicate the throne or go to war, and that he has decided to take the latter course. Turkey is concentrating troops at various strategic points.

The Balkan situation was reported Thursday as alarming. It is rumored that King Milan, of Servia, intends to issue a declaration of war against Bulgaria. If this is done—and the story is current and generally believed in all the capitals of Europe—it is difficult to see how a great struggle can be averted. The sultan continues his preparatious for hostilities, and throughout Turkey the war feeling is at its height.

The Servian army, with King Milan in command, crossed the Bulgarian frontier Friday afternoon, and at latest advices was advancing toward Sofia.

The trouble between Burmah and the government of India will probably lead to the annexation of the former to India. The matter was seriously discussed at the Indian office to-day. It is generally believed that a sufficient force will be sent to Mandalay to depose King Thebaw and annex the country to India in order to prevent further complications whenever the King of Burmah wants to raise money to give a great feast.

The Czar has issued a ukase forbidding the general celebration, March 3d, of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the emancipation of the serfs of Russia. He fears that it would be made the occasion for a general Nihilistic rising. The reported advance of Servians into Bulgaria is denied by the latest advances. The ambassadors have issued a collective note, stating that the powers had resolved to assist Turkey in quelling the Roumelian rebellion and upholding existing treaties. The Roumelians and Bulgarians have been warned not to commit excesses for which they themselves must suffer without hope of outside assistance.

This Washboard is made of one solid sheet of heavy corrugated zinc, which produces a double-faced board of the best quality and durability. The fluting is very deep, holding more water, and consequently doing better washing than any washboard in the market. The frame is made of hard wood and held together with an iron bolt running through a tube formed on the lower edge of the zinc, thus binding the whole together in the most substantial manner, and producing a wash board which for economy, excellence and durability, is unquestionably the best in the world. We find so many dealers that object to our board on account of its DURABILITY, saying, "It will last too long. We can never sell a customer but one." We take this means to advise customers to INSIST upon having the NORTH STAR WASHBOARD.

The best is the cheapest.

We will forward board on receipt of price.

And take no other. If he does not keep it, it is because of its durability. Price, Family Size, 50 cents; Laundry size, 75 cents.

The Illinois State Baptist Association concluded its convention at Rockford Friday evening and decided to hold its next meeting at Springfield. A resolution was unanimously adopted by a rising vote asking the Rev. George C. Lorimer, the celebrated Knight Templar, to take the Presidency of Chicago University. With its big debt and a Masonic management besides, the University will soon be swamped.

The Knights of Labor in St. Louis have been compelled to draw off their forces and declare the street car strike off. The manifesto first put forth by the men sets forth such a state of affairs as should have immediately aroused public sympathy, and thus compelled the companies to accede to their demands. Their strike was followed by such desperate rioting that their case should have been doubly sure. But the fact of their failure shows: first, that the public have not accepted their statement as true; and second, that the secret society management has been a total failure. The companies refused very properly to treat with any secret society, and have been able to resume their traffic satisfactorily. Mr. Powderly must do better with his lodge than in St. Louis and on the Union Pacific road, or it will not be worth maintaining.

The Iowa W. C. T. Union was noticed last week as in hostility to the National body in the matter of politics. The latter has resolved for two years, at Detroit and at St. Louis, to co-operate with that political party which should best represent its principles. The American party, we claimed at the time and still insist, is the one which should receive the favor of this magnificent woman's organization. But because they preferred to smile on the Prohibitionists we shall not join Mrs. Foster and Dr Dorchester in their National League, which the latter publicly confessed at Philadelphia was rather "anti-partisan" than "non-partisan." It seems after all that Mrs. Foster and the Iowa Union when they put their grievances on paper have not so much of a quarrel. They resolved to "recommend to the State union and its auxiliaries that they continue to co-operate with men in political action to secure such measures as shall advance our temperance work."

It remains for some of our English friends to explain the popular contempt for the royal family, which is not easily understood on this sidethe water. A stump orator of the Liberal party was lately hissed and hooted for a complimentary reference to the Queen's family. The Marquis of Lorne, Queen's son-in-law, has made his appearance as a Liberal candidate for Parliament with very radical opinions, advocating free education and immediate disestablishment of the Scottish church. He champions the Free Land League, encouraging a subdivision of the land into small lots. Now, the advocacy of such sentiments ought to be popular, and doubly so when maintained by a member of the royal family. It should be the occasion of popular rejoicing. But the other day when Lord Lorne went to Brentford, a town seven miles from London, to make a campaign speech, a mob assaulted him with rotten eggs, and some of them, gaining the platform, smashed his hat over his head. His friends rushed to his rescue and a fight ensued. The noble Lord now became so thoroughly frightened that he got through the crowd, ran through the streets in drenching rain to the railway station, and immediately departed for London. He will certainly have to be braver than that or he never will do for an Anti-masonic lecturer; and his family sorely needs a prophet of that vocation.

President Cleveland will begin to appreciate the opposition of the Roman Catholics. Mr. Kieley, a Catholic, was refused as our minister by Austria, probably for the expression of some liberal sentiments. He was a strong advocate of the public school system, and discussed that subject earnestly a few months ago with one of the Roman Catholic bishops, in the columns of the North American Review. Whether for this bold dispute with a member of the hierarchy Catholic influence prevented his going to Austria or not, the refusal cost the government much annoyance. And now the gentleman appointed to Spain, J. L. M. Curry, is opposed strenuously by the Romanists of Richmond, because he has indulged in hostile criticism of the Catholic church. Mr. Curry has had considerable and varied public experience. He was a graduate of the Harvard Law School, a Texas ranger, State legislator, national elector, member of Congress, of the Confederate congress, Confederate colonel, pastor of a Baptist church, president of Howard college, Alabama, professor in Richmond college, Virginia, and president of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Southern Baptist convention. He still holds this position. As general agent of the Peabody Education fund he has addressed every Southern legislature, and has labored assiduously to promote the establishment and improvement of public schools in the South. He has been specially distinguished for his bold and earnest advocacy of the education of the negroes. A gentleman of such rare experience ought to be acceptable to almost everybody.

The New York Independent lately commenting on the new version of the Bible thinks it is not beyond improvement, and would like to put the work into the hands of Matthew Arnold, James Russell Lowell, and John Tyndall, whose knowledge of the English language, not their religious character, would be the reason for the singular choice. Mr. Lowell has contributed an occasional public testimony for the Christian religion, as powerful as gracefully expressed; but nobody has yet forgotten Prof. Tyndall's notorious "prayer-test," and the Philistine scoff with which he propounded it; and as for Mr. Arnold, the Independent shall bear witness against itself. The next week after the remark noticed above, the Independent speaking of Matthew Arnold's "contemptuous treatment of the late Earl of Shaftesbury," calls him "the brilliant essayist, who does not know whether there is any God, or only a force and tendency" who says "the evangelical idea of God was of an almighty Lord Shaftesbury." The almost blasphemous flippancy of Arnold is no worse than the outrageous proposition of the Independent who would strain the Word of God through such minds as Tyndall's and Arnold's, or would give us the rays of the Sun of Righteousness distorted and obscured through their lenses. The interposition of such agents between men and their God is as much worse than the confessional as the Independent is more enlightened than the priest.

Dr. Galusha Anderson has just accepted a call to Salem, Massachusetts, after several years noble service, as president, amid the hopeless complications that have beset the Chicago University. The effort to secure him for Vassar College and its failure by one or two votes is too recent to be forgotten. This failure has served again to draw attention to those "harmless" college secret societies. A correspondent of the New York Examiner repeats what has been often said by others and accounting for the vote of the Vassar trustees: "The old offense was that Dr. Anderson, when a boy, consented to join one of the Greek letter societies on the express promise of the leaders that there were no oaths taken in the ceremony of initiation. When half through the initiation, and a terrible oath was about to be administered, he protested and refused to go through with the ceremony, and the persecution began." This charge against the college societies has been very persistently made, and as earnestly repudiated. Whether it is true in Dr. Anderson's case or no, the very fact that it has aroused such a controversy is proof that the character of these societies is not well enough understood, when so many able men, who must be supposed to know whereof they speak, accuse them of an act that deserves universal execration. This episode in the life of Dr. Anderson must remind every one familiar with the early career of the celebrated Nathaniel Colver, who for similar reasons marched out of a Masonic lodge. Only, Dr. Colver did not bushel his light, but made Tremont Temple flame like a volcano against the infamy practiced in the lodge. Would that Dr. Anderson would give us a like testimony.

MISSION CHURCHES IN THE SOUTH.

A VERY IMPORTANT LETTER.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—I feel sure that if you fully understand the situation you would not disparage the good which is being done at the South in the midst of so many and formidable hindrances. You say (page 8, Oct. 15th,) inasmuch as none of our colored (Mission) churches exclude secret society members, "such churches are not worth supporting and the wonder is that sensible people give them support."

Now, it is true that none of our churches take the ground of excluding those who belong to secret orders, but walking and running usually follow the "creeping" period. Our feeble churches under the fostering care of the American Missionary Association have to make their way among the people, confronted by the deep-rooted sectarianism of other churches. The great numbers flock to those places in which they escape the efforts which we make to establish an intelligent idea of worship. Many of the more ignorant would have nothing to do with a church in which their rude ways are not tolerated.

We have had the period of political strife and trouble; we still realize the weight of these things; the recognition of our rights as citizens in certain important matters is still an open question. We Congregationalists are innovators—we are new and strange to the country. On the other hand it is generally true, I believe, that our pastors are in sympathy with the idea of reform on the society question. It is well known by the Grand Masters and secretists generally that the A. M. A., though conservative, is nevertheless, opposed to these oath-bound orders. Most of our A. M. A. churches have for pastors young men who are aware of the tremendous influence of the "societies."

What is the wise way to do the right thing? I have been for five years pastor of a church which was organized in 1868. For ten years it was under the care and teaching of a minister from New England, whose views opposed to secretism were well defined and known abroad: but it was not his policy to commit the church against them. Indeed, in his time, 1868–1878, there was less necessity than now. In five years the church has grown from 79 to 115 members, deducting all losses by death and removals. We have a few members who are adherents of the Masons, Odd-fellows, etc., perhaps about ten. At various times I have spoken against some of the prominent features of secret orders, but having other serious matters to deal with,—unity, co-operation, courage, discipline to promote—it has been a serious question with me what I ought to do about the society question. I knew of no other minister in the city who would sympathize with me. In private conversation with ministers who belong to the lodges, Methodist and Baptist ministers and in one case a bishop, I was more and more surprised to find a common assent to the fact that serious evils to the church and community were proceeding from a bad element in the societies. The churches were subordinated to the power and will of ambitious and selfish men. There are pastors here now who will confess these things, while from the pulpit they dare not say one word against the lodge.

Furthermore, I see how large a part ignorance plays in the power which the lodge has with our people. Given a few intelligent, crafty and selfish leaders, and they can control the masses with regalia, music and mysterious mummery.

I decided to speak as occasion might serve, not opening a regular campaign against the lodge unless the way opened for a chance to "go forward." When I found that Bro. Brinkley had taken a stand, and finally Mr. Countee was brought out, and began to speak openly, and they offered the columns of their paper to any one who would take up the subject, it seemed to me the time had come. I had no choice then but to bear witness to the truth more openly and fully. When the mob raised an alarm, quite a number of my people begged me to desist from the discussion, lest harm to our property or to myself might come. They were very much alarmed. I had no fear except for the church, and the grief of my family.

I changed somewhat my method but continued from the pulpit to show how much at variance the character and spirit of these organizations are from Christ and his Gospel: and also the duty of the ministry to try all questions, all institutions and teachings of men by the Word of God. This had a good effect which will not be lost. Meanwhile, I intend to enlighten the church on the subject, as soon and as clearly as the Lord shall show and help me to do.

The time must come when a more enlightened church can deal with this question as they cannot now, or certainly could not hitherto. I have had deep convictions all the while and many things to say to them which they were not able to bear. Gathering up the tares sometimes puts the wheat in danger. Our mission churches may be moving slowly as reformatory influences, but I remember the picture of Atlas with the world on his shoulders, and that famous character is rather in a lifting than a walking attitude.

Your readers, many of them, can have but a partial idea of how difficult it is to deal with both ignorance and prejudice, which are both allied with other evil spirits in this question. No, sir, if you would help us, please encourage the friends of this mission work to sustain it, and advance it, knowing what formidable obstacles the Association has had to contend with. From my views on the subject of secretism I wonder more and more at the silence of the religious press and of the pulpit. I cannot understand it.

The A. M. A. is dependent on the churches, yet stands fully committed in favor of this reform. I have interesting letters from two of the secretaries. Talladega as a centre of learning sends out her students well informed on this question, and I think they are generally opposed to secretism.

The question is not so much: Is it wrong? Shall we oppose? etc., as, How shall we wisely go about it? It is a new enterprise, with no present advantage apparent, only in case of conscience. Few of us are born heroes or reformers in the usual sense of the term: we lack experience.

But, sir, I think our work is not a failure. If we are not felling the larger trees, we may be making way for that by clearing off the underbrush and gathering out the stones. Our enemies, the secretists, would be glad to hear that your counsel is against sustaining our work. When so few older and wealthier churches among a more enlightened people are willing to commit themselves against the lodge some allowance should be made for poor and weak mission churches.

I am for no compromise with the evil, but some degree of toleration seems absolutely necessary at present. Solon made the best laws which could be executed among the Athenians in his time. He looked forward to better conditions and better statutes.

A comparatively few among our people can read well enough to understand the valuable literature which you publish to expose secretism, and in many cases the leaders who can read have their minds closed by self-interest and prejudice.

We must do the best we can to meet these things, while in the name of our God we set up our banners. Truly yours. B. A. Imes.

WEEK-DAY SERMON.

BY E. E. FLAGG.

The feeding of the five thousand with the five barley loaves and the two small fishes is not a wonderful miracle merely, it is a parable with a golden truth at the heart of it. We see the thousands of hungry, fainting peasants, the Lord's compassionate yet untroubled face, the perplexed disciples, and the lad with his loaves and fishes; and straightway the picture becomes, if we will have it so, a divine prophecy for each and all of us.

What soul that has actually entered Christ's service does not feel at times depressed and sad at thought of the vast discrepancy between his abilities and the work to which he is called? What is his time, strength, money, or whatever other talent he may possess, among the great world's sinning, suffering multitudes? "Two hundred pennyworth of bread are not sufficient for them, that every one of them may take a little." The riches of Rothschild, the genius of Shakespeare, even the eloquence of Paul, if they could be combined in one man, would go but a short way towards filling up the great gulfs of human need. And we who have but five loaves and two small fishes are ashamed to set such a meagre contribution against immeasurable wants. Instead of putting it into the hands of Jesus to see what divine miracle of multiplication his grace can work, we hide it away in fear and unbelief; and the one panting soul to whom we might have ministered goes away unrefreshed because we have not the two hundred pennyworth!

There are Christians enough to evanlgelize the world, to put down every evil, and bring in Christ's millennial reign. Why is it not done? Is it not because we fail in this all-important point? We do not surrender our one talent to Christ, because it is only one talent, forgetting that the touch of his hand can multiply it a hundred fold.

In this autumn sunshine falling on reaped fields which have witnessed once again the earth's yearly miracle—of a world fed by that grand multiplication system of the Creator called seedtime and harvest, comes this autumn thought. The same needs that stirred Jesus's heart with compassion on the multitude, exist to-day. Our churchless masses hunger for the Word, and atheism stands ready to give them a stone in place of bread. Wherewithal shall we satisfy them? By each individual Christian surrendering his every faculty to be used in the world's redemption. Those faculties may be the humblest, the most ordinary, but once given up, freely, fully, heartily, and we shall see the old miracle renewed before our eyes. Again five loaves and two small fishes feed a multitude.

WHAT SAITH THE MASTER?

BY REV. ISAAC HYATT,

"One is your Master, even Christ." Therefore all our opinions, wishes, and acts ought to be subservient to his will.

Whatever he approves and loves we ought to approve and love. Whatever he disapproves and hates we ought to disapprove and hate. It is easier to assent to this intellectually, than to do it in heart and practice.

Yet to the best of our ability it can be done, and however much self-denial it may cost, it is the only safe and successful course for us to pursue.

Though men honestly differ in opinions our greatest danger does not arise so much from this as from the bias self-interest gives to our judgment. Hence the necessity for an unswerving standard that is not effected by circumstances of any kind. Such a standard is Christ.

With these thoughts in mind, what think you he thinks of Freemasonry and other oath-bound secret societies?

John Q. Adams was one of the most intellectual, scholarly, and pious of our Presidents. And it may surprise some of my youthful readers to learn that he said, "Secrets written in blood should be unveiled; a tree that bears such fruits should be hewn down.

"No butcher would mutilate the carcass of a bullock or a swine, as the Masonic candidate swears consent to the mutilation of his own, for the breach of an absurd and senseless secret. It is an oath of which a common cannibal would be ashamed."

But by careful investigation you will learn that similar sentiments have been uttered by many of the greatest and best citizens of our country. It is true you will have to secure the records of the past generations or the Anti masonic library published by the National Christian Association to learn these facts. Because for some mysterious reason they are seldom found in the histories or refered to in the popular addresses of this generation. However Anti-masonic opinions should not turn the balance a feather's weight against oath bound secret societies if Christ approves them. Contrawise, no matter who approves them, if Christ condemns them, so ought we.

Though Christ never spoke against Freemasonry, Odd-fellowship, Mormonism or any other secret society, he condemned the principles constituting the base and superstructure of them all. The whole force of his example and teaching is against organized secrecy. He only told his disciples to pray and give alms in secret. As a teacher he spake openly to the world and in secret said nothing. John 18: 20.

He taught no private or concealed doctrine. Just the same as teachers in our common schools and various institutions do—so he taught in private because he could do it to better advantage. But when they were assembled together as a school by themselves, he said to them, "What I say unto you in darkness, that speak ye in light; and what ye hear in the ear, that preach ye upon the housetops." Mat. 10: 27; also in Luke 12: 2, 3.

Hence nothing is plainer than that if his example and teaching were universally adhered to, secret societies would universally cease to exist.

FREEMASONRY VS. CHRISTIANITY.

BY T. S. WALTER.

Whoever denies that Freemasonry is a religion confesses his ignorance of standard Masonic authors. Now, every system of religion is opposed to all other systems of religion. This is true in the abstract. If Freemasonry is a religion it must necessarily be opposed to the religion of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. In all matters to arrive at a just conclusion the mind makes a comparison. A boy takes a stone in each hand and soon ascertains, by comparison, which is the heavier. Now let us compare some of the characteristics of Masonry and of the Christian religion.

The religion of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ invites the world—all men. "Ho! every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters." "Look unto me all ye ends of the earth and be ye saved." Freemasonry splits the human family in two and leaves the female half (our better half) out, save in a mock side issue—a Rebecca degree.

Again, the religion of Jesus invites the little ones. Freemasonry says, not in your NONAGE. Jesus says: "Suffer the children to come unto me." Freemasonry says, After you can take care of yourself, come. God's great mercy still invites, so that the old may come. "Old men and maidens, let them call upon the name of Lord." Freemasonry says, "Not in your dotage." Jesus invites the poor, lame, blind, and halt. Freemasonry says, "None of these." Thus we see Freemasonry is only a "class" religion, and as to saving the human family it is not sufficient. It is split in two from end to end and leaves out our mothers, wives, sisters and daughters. It is too short at both ends, for it leaves out the old and young. It is broken in two in the middle for it leaves out the blind, lame, and poor.

In being removed from the "lodge below to the Grand Lodge above" we leave our mothers, wives, sisters and children; and instead of joining in the mighty hallelujahs of heaven and songs of the Redeemed—why—why, what? Why, we have a "stag dance!" No wife with her refining influence; no mother that taught us to lisp the name of Jesus in our evening prayers; no children of whom the Saviour said, "Of such is the kingdom of [Masonry!] heaven." How glad I am that I was born a man, and lived to be of a saving age—past 21, Masonically speaking. But I am thankful in the depth of my heart, that Jesus saves me with my mother, my wife, my sisters, and my children—yes, the religion of Jesus is for all.

WASHINGTON DEFENDED FROM THE CLAIMS OF FREEMASONS.

[By Hon. Richard Rush in a letter to the Mass. State Anti-masonic Convention, June 30 1831.]

When Masonry calls the name of Washington to its aid, it commits a profanation rivalling, in its way, the murder of Morgan as a public crime. It is difficult to speak of it and maintain a proper decorum; as if that matchless patriot and hero, he who founded our Republic and therefore gave it its laws, who led us through the countless trials of a seven years' war without a single violation of the law, as if he, could he have lived to see the day when a band of conspirators from the brotherhood would ferociously murder a citizen and then defy the law, under oaths and salvoes which but for Masonry they never would have dreamed of,—as if he would not have been the very first to uproot all its foundations, could he have witnessed this spectacle. As surely as he always vindicated the supremacy of the law, so surely would he have given up Masonry when he found it stronger than the law. As surely as he tore to pieces his oath of allegience to George III., that once bound him to monarchy, so surely would he have given to the winds all the extrajudicial and bombastical oaths that once bound him to Masonry. There are some persons belonging to this institution, who cannot or will not reason upon the subject of it; but from enlightened and candid Masons we may hope otherwise; and before the great body of the public we have a right to expect, that it will be considered and treated like any other source of danger to the public. Its charity, like all other virtue, would survive the stroke of death, and find other channels through which to diffuse its relief among the sons of men. Above all, Masonry is out of place in the United States. It is a hideous exotic. It is foreign in its original conception, and in all its present habits. Its complication and concealments are not American, nor its ceremonial, nor any part of its hyperbolical nomenclature. An atmosphere of political freedom and openness, is not its element. It has nothing fairly to do here, and as its spirit is active, it will be doing mischief. The wonder is, that it should have existed as long as it has done under institutions so totally opposite, in genius, to its entire creed and operations. It is too exclusive, too demanding, too intense in its sympathies within its own orbit, to have favor with a people jealous of all movements apart from their own body, where no oaths tie down, no mysteries darken the path of conduct. It has escaped the hand of American reform chiefly because, to the bulk of the people, it has remained unknown.

A RAILROAD MAN'S PROPOSAL.

The Pittsburgh Despatch reports Vice President King, of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, as saying: "I notice that the Christian Reform Convention is in favor of stopping the running of trains on the Sabbath, and proposes to ask the government to stop Sabbath mail transportation. The Sabbath train stoppage would not be objectionable to railroad men if one little arrangement was made. Let them stop the interest-earning power on railroad bonds and securities on the Sabbath, and then we can stop the trains. It is a question of stopping the earning power of money as well as the laboring power of money. If one is stopped the other should be, too."

The suggestion which is here made deserves attentive consideration. If we understand it correctly it is this: A railroad borrows money in large amounts, and gives bonds for it, bearing interest at a fixed per cent per annum. As the Sabbaths of the year are not counted out of the time for which interest must be paid, the railroad must needs prosecute its business on the Sabbath in order to earn the money wherewith to pay its constantly accumulating interest.

If this suggestion is sound, then it applies to every man who has borrowed money. The farmer who has given a mortgage on his farm, the merchant trading on borrowed capital, all the world's great commercial and industrial enterprises in which money is invested to secure returns of interest does not cease on that day. Every creditor who has loaned money, will, moreover, under this argument, be disposed to favor, or to urge, the continuance of labor on the Sabbath that he may not fail of his interest. This argument, therefore, at one sweep, practically abolishes all laws of divine or human governments in reference to the Sabbath.

There must be a fallacy here. The truth is, all existing business arrangements have been made under laws which recognize the Sabbath, and guard it from desecration. The Sabbath is a dies non, in the eye of the law. A note made on the Sabbath is void. A debt falling due on the Sabbath, cannot on that day be collected. The taeit but explicit understanding between the giver and receiver of a loan, unless they have conspired together to break the laws, is that labor and business are not to be carried on on the Sabbath. Mr. King seems to suggest legislation to the effect that, if the railroads be compelled to cease operations on the Sabbath, they shall pay less interest on their bonds. Our reply is that their interest rate has already been adjusted, under existing laws, to the observance of the Sabbath.

Besides, it has been amply demonstrated that human energy, in all its forms, meets in the long run, with better pecuniary rewards if it observes the Sabbath. The railroad system of the United States, if it would keep the Sabbath, would be not less able, but better able, on that account to meet all its pecuniary obligations. The same volume of business would be done, and would be better done. Employees, refreshed in body and mind, and strengthened against temptation by the moral and religious influences of the day, would render better service. The corporations would not set before their men a continual example of law-breaking, to bear fruit, now and then, in such outbreaks as the Pittsburg riots of 1877. The testimony of railroad men themselves on this point is very explicit. President Ledyard, of the Michigan Centfal Railroad, has said: "I do not believe at the end of the year, the loss in traffic would be appreciable if all Sunday work were stopped, and in the better morals of the men the railway companies would be abundantly repaid."—Christian Statesman.

FREEMASONS IN GUINEA.

When the cooler breaths set in from the direction of the river we set out once more to complete the circuit of the city of Abeokuta, on the gold coast of Africa. Outche was sent to gather up our baggage, while our guide proposed to lead us where we could find lodgings with a "tribe," as he termed it of very queer people. He described them as "having motions." This seemed very definite. We had already imagined that motions were incident to all animated beings. He persisted, however, in his statement, and added that they were motions different from those of other people. He also positively asserted that they could fly, and although no one could see them when they were in the act, yet they must fly, as they took messages down to the coast and brought back answers, doing the whole business in a few hours—always in the night.

He also declared that there was a tribe of these "motion" men up on the cannibal coast of Appolonia to the west of the Gold Coast. Now we would give no space to recording this gabble if subsequent developments had not made it worthy of note. To my question if they had no other name, he said, "Oh, yes, they are Freemasons." Now, we admit that this confession caused some perturbation in our hair. We had supposed that our experience with the mystic brotherhood had been a bona fide business, but we had never been initiated into this rite. Here was an opportunity to take another degree. The dividing distance was soon passed over, and the colony of "motion" men reached. They proved to be an industrious tribe, rather above the standard in intelligence, and were as a matter of fact accepted Masons. Various trials proved this, and an exhibition of work showed them well up in the craft. They claimed kinship under a dispensation from the East, dating back beyond their remembrance. But they were working an unmasonic scheme by practicing on the superstitious notions of the uninitiated, and quietly pocketing no small gains thereby.

They had some means of rapid communication with the coast, and when an order was given to carry a message they would put off the time of carrying ostensibly, but would set in motion their secret agents at once, and on the day when they declared the omens all right would "fly by night"—so thought the ignorant native—and in one night bring back an answer. They were acknowledged to be honest and faithful in carrying money and valuables, and were the expressmen for the residents in all their money transactions with the coast. We did not give them away, but very much astonished our interpreter when he saw us received by them as a brother. He ever after regarded his employer as a mystery.—Guinea Correspondence Boston Commercial Bulletin.

Many years ago, when Bishop Thompson of the Methodist Episcopal church was editor of the New York Christian Advocate, his son in school, at home in Delaware, wrote for money. The answer of the bishop gives us a hint of what he thought of secret societies and the expenditure for regalia. He says, "Yours of the 1st is before me. I cannot give you six dollars to be spent in such a vain and foolish way as the buying of a secret-society badge. Money is the gift of God, and in spending it I regard myself as his steward. I would much rather give you six dollars to give to the poor." There is that in these words which suggests much to any man, not only as to the waste of money in secret societies, but the general use of money as well.—Telescope.

SECRET DANCERS.

The high moral and religious tone of secret societies is often evidenced in their practical proclivity to the dancing business. The papers of the country are full of accounts of Odd-fellow and Masonic balls. The lesser orders are adepts at evincing the characteristics of their paternity. We have, from this fact, balls under the patronage of nearly, if not quite, all the secret brotherhoods and sisterhoods of the country. Who dares to say that these secret dancing fraternities are not just the place for our pious church members, including class-leaders, deacons and ministers? especially if they are good dancers, or desire to become such by these secretly approved methods. These dances are perfectly legitimate to the character of such ungodly and conglomerated associations. As bad as the common dance may be, it is not the out-cropping of the worst characteristics of secret societies, by any manner of means. The treasonable character of these societies as against the legal interests of the rest of the world, in sworn favoritism to members of the clan; the blood-letting and murder-breathing character of at least many of these obligations, leave dancing largely distanced by their barbarous brutality. This secret dance business is bad enough, one would think, to brand these institutions with moral infamy in the estimation of all true lovers of Christ and his salvation.—Wesleyan Methodist.

WAS PAUL EVER MARRIED?

Is there any evidence that Paul or Saul, before his conversion was a married man?

Certainly. He says (Acts 26: 10) of the disciples, "When they were put to death, I gave my voice (in the Revision, vote) against them." The Greek word here means literally pebble. The votes in the Sanhedrim were cast with black and white pebbles. This seems clear evidence that Saul was a member of the Sanhedrim, the only Jewish court which the Romans allowed to inflict death. But the conditions of membership in that body were numerous and strict. One of them was that the candidate must not only be a husband, but a father, "that he might be able to sympathize with the domestic life of the people." When, therefore, Paul says of the unmarried and widows among the Corinthians (1 Cor. 7 : 8) "It is good if they abide even as I," the inference is that he had lost both his wife and child or children; and that, in those times of persecution and peril, it was better that for a season a marriage should not be contracted.—Advance.

The action last week of the Virginia colored Republicans in withdrawing from the Republican party and announcing themselves as Independents, and so appealing to their brothers of color in the State, is of itself a large straw to show the veering winds of politics. But when we read their appeal including the statements that "the Republican party has repeatedly abandoned its colored supporters after gaining their votes, and that the outrages in the South, which have resulted in the murder of many negroes, have been due to a great extent to Federal mismanagement," we wonder what John Sherman and all his war-issue-reviving kind will say. Nor does our wonder cease, as we learn that on the same day [Wednesday] the Republicans of Massacusetts, in their State convention, appealed to an aroused public conscience to "prevent further suppression of the negro vote in the South."—The Center, Detroit.

When Garibaldi was going out to battle, he told his troops what he wanted them to do, and after he had described what he wanted them to do, they said, "Well, General, what are you going to give us for all this?" "Well," he replied, "I don't know what else you will get, but you will get hunger, and cold, and wounds and death. How do you like it?" His men stood before him a little while in silence, and then they threw up their hands and cried, "We are the men! We are the men!" The Lord Jesus Christ calls you to his service. I do not promise you an easy time in this world. You may have persecutions, and trials, and misrepresentations; but afterwards there comes an eternal weight of glory, and you can bear the wounds, and the bruises, and the misrepresentations, if you can have the reward afterward. Have you not enough enthusiasm to cry out, "We are the men! We are the men"?—Talmage.

FROM THE GENERAL AGENT.

THE FAYETTE COUNTY CONVENTION, IOWA.

Savanna, Ill., Oct. 19, 1885.

Sabbath with the "Brethren" at Lanark was a profitable and enjoyable day. Prof. S. Z. Sharp from Mt. Morris gave solid food to those who waited on his ministry. It was special service, with the "Lord's Supper" followed by "Communion" in the evening. I did not attend the baptism a mile and a half away, but the preceeding examination and instruction were radical and Biblical. Gaudy apparel, theaters, shows, church festivals, war and secret societies were reprobated, and a part of the 18th of Matthew read as the covenant of faith and practice. Here, as with the Swedish Lutherans, I noticed that the male and female membership was about in equal proportion, and there were many young men as well as women in the church.

Calling on some of our old subscribers I met a hearty welcome, and was especially pleased to learn that they had not "made shipwreck of their faith." I was disappointed in my efforts to re-enlist them, but still hope that when we get a little farther from the Presidential campaign they will place their names again on the muster roll of our weekly readers.

West Union, Iowa.—I fell in with Bro. Shimer on his way to the convention, and reaching here together at 11:30, we were soon in company with Bro. Hawley, who is looking hearty, and other brethren who are alive and active in the cause. Bros. Hunt of the Wesleyan, and Gardner of the U. B. church are efficient helpers, and Elder Winslow is pronounced and aggressive.

Oct. 20.—The dark and rain and the work of the emissaries of the "ruler of darkness," the god of this world, so far prevailed as to prevent a large gathering last evening, but we met the faithful few and fell back on the "precious promises." Some twenty gathered in the court room this A. M., and spent the time in prayer and conference. Delegations are expected this afternoon from neighboring towns, and business was delayed for their coming.

Oct. 21.—We were not disappointed in our expectations, but gladdened by the coming of our brethren. Bro. Morley, Father Babcock, and Judge Rodgers, with a number of others were on hand and added strength and courage. The day was variegated with snow, sleet, rain and sunshine, so wisely interspersed as to inspire hope and test faith, and the evening brought a fair audience in spite of a grand Republican rally, addressed by ex-Postmaster Palmer of Chicago.

Oct. 22.—Wednesday was the best day of the convention. The forenoon was given up to business and organization of the county, of which the secretary will furnish a report. At 3:30 P. M. Bro. Hawley gave a thoroughly prepared and forcibly presented lecture, and the evening was assigned to me. The audience was much larger than at any time preceding, notwithstanding there was a grand Democratic rally, addressed by Col. Cameron of Chicago. There were some who felt disturbed by unpleasant odors from sulphur or tobacco or some very offensive substance burned in the room below. I did not, while speaking, notice the matter, but others, especially those in the rear of the hall, report it quite offensive. After my talk of an hour, Bro. Hawley gave a clear and critical analysis of the oaths found in the secret system, and after a collection the convention closed with the benediction.

A FEW FACTS FROM COLUMBUS.

Columbus, Ohio, has a population of about seventy-five thousand. Its saloons exceed its groceries—its lodge members are legion. There are fifty-seven different secret societies advertized: nine blue lodges and three Knight Templar commanderies.

The mayor, Col. Wolcott, a Knight Templar, Mason and Odd-fellow, and a man who gets drunk, says, "Masonry is a good, moral institution. They even require their members to believe in a god." I asked him if the name of Christ was used in the lodge. He replied, "That is contrary to our rules." He said he thought that nearly all the city officers belonged to the lodge.

Many of the churches here are, as at other places, bound. Rev. Mauk, pastor of the United Brethren church, said to me on Sabbath, "We have stood against the dam (meaning opposition to the lodge) as long as we can, and now we have got to go with the tide." Two-thirds of his members do not agree with him. He has got to take a different stand or leave this church, they say. Their pastor last year was an Odd-fellow, who, I am told by leading members, took an underhand way to make it appear at the last conference that the majority of the church were in favor of doing away with their rule against secret societies.

Brethren Turner, Brown, and others gladly subscribed for the Cynosure, and are arranging for meetings. Our Lutheran friends have many large and wealthy churches, a large university, and several papers which speak with no uncertain sound against the lodge. Dr. Loy will consult with the faculty of the University about having lectures before the students. Bro. Pettit subscribes for the Cynosure and will arrange for lectures in the Friends' church.

Bro. C. W. Hiatt is building up his church. Fourteen members were received recently, I am told. His position on the secreey question is generally known. He is guiding those to the light of life who are in darkness. The other Congregational pastors are generally nominally opposed to the lodge.

A prominent Methodist pastor preached against secretism on last Sabbath. While there is a terrible power here in favor of the lodge, there is a growing power against it. Political corruption can no longer be hid. The masses are tired and sick of the "wickedness in high places," but do not fully understand its cause. They do not know that when a man swears allegiance to unknown superiors, he ordinarily will no longer be a good citizen.

I have every evidence to believe that God is leading here and that the interest which is already manifested is "but as the sound of the going in the top of the mulberry trees." God opens doors, and I find friends everywhere. Will not every lover of light in the State of Ohio, labor and pray that our State meeting which is to ocenr here, commencing on the 15th day of next December, may be the most glorious victory for the right we have ever had?

I am stopping at the home of Bro. K. A. Orvis, who has long advocated the principles of the Cynosure.

Let me hear from you, friends. Address No. 214 W. Second Ave., Columbus, O. Yours for work,

W. B. Stoddard.

FROM THE ILLINOIS AGENT.

Bro. Geo. T. Dissette has been for a fortnight laboring in Du Page county round about his home. From his long report to the State Executive Committee we make a few extracts. At Prospect Park he could secure neither the Free Methodist nor Congregational churches, but rented the W. C. T. U. hall. The meeting was prevented by a heavy and continued rain. At Turner Junction he found the Congregational minister a strong temperance man and a nominal Mason; but a man of intelligence whose mind would naturally revolt from the lodge, if its true character were seen. The Methodist pastor, McGuffin, is a Mason and occasionally lectures for the lodge. For this prostitution of his powers he gets good pay, sometimes as much as $100.

The report continues:

At Lombard I could make no arrangements at present for a lecture, but Rev. Charles Caverno, pastor of the Congregational church and Dea. Isaac Claflin promised that we should hear from them when the way is open, as there are other matters which will interfere with an immediate arrangement.

At Elmhurst, had the honor of an introduction to Rev. Peter Goebel, Inspector of Pro Seminary of the German Evangelical Synod of North America, he informed me that they would on no account tolerate a minister in their Association, nor a student in their seminary who adhered to secret societies. He also said that the Cynosure was a welcome visitor in the reading rooms of the institution. He expressed quite an interest in our work and hoped soon to name a time when they could have a lecture or a course of lectures before their students which may impress upon their minds that their church wisely excludes from her membership those who are members of secret orders. Thus a lecture will supplement the work in which, they, as pastors and teachers, are engaged. The lectures by Pres. Blanchard and others in this institution are yet remembered. The cordial, open-hearted, outspoken reception which I here received I shall not soon forget. Rev. Daniel Irion, pastor of the Evangelical church, is in hearty sympathy with our reform. He was quite pleased to learn that there was a prospect of having a lecture there; would have me stay for dinner, and when I left, bade me a hearty Godspeed.

At Bensonville I was told: "There is one secret society man in town He is a saloonkeeper and an Odd-fellow."

At Itasca there is a new Presbyterian church. The acting pastor, E. R. Worrell, was absent. Dr. Smith, one of the trustees, assured me that I could have that church without let or hindrance: that I was welcome to preach or lecture in it any night during the week or on Sabbath if their pastor did not come.

Monday evening, after a rainy day, a larger audience than was anticipated attended the lecture and listened attentively; and though I was restrained from preaching on the previous evening by the will of an absent Freemason, this evening the presence of a number of Freemasons on the front seats gave zest to the occasion, and from their respectful attention we trust that they are interested and inclined to fairly consider this question.

Meacham is contiguous to Itasca, being but little more than a mile distant. I sent a notice of my lecture to the M. E. church in that place; the newly appointed pastor, Rev. Mr. Scarrow, read it in the morning to the people, but in the evening he read two others and taking it up said to the audience, "This notice I'll not read again. I take no stock in such things. Regarding such things I feel Mind your own business."

There is no church or hall in Roselle. But I reviewed the oaths of Freemasonry in the depot. A Master Mason who heard me through said that he was a member of the Presbyterian church, that he considered that all these secret societies were an abomination, Freemasonry pre eminently so; that he knew that the wealthy or moneyed men belonging to the secret labor organizations are all Masons, and that they control these working men all through these strikes. He was a Knight of Malta as long as that organization held together. He spoke of candidates being stripped, hoodwinked, hands tied behind them, and seated on the top round of a ladder, where they were compelled to confess the irregularities of their lives, at the close of which, the members would kick the ladder from under them, hurling them headlong into a vat of cold water; of their being hustled into boilers, on which the members would hammer and raise an awful din; of their being jostled from the top of a ladder into a canvass surrounded by men, who, by all pulling together would toss them high in air; of their being seated on ice devoid of clothes, to extort from them the secrets of their lives; and finally, of the death of one candidate, and with him the death of the order. "But we used to have lots of fun," he continued. "My! the big suppers! The most of the money went for big suppers—the initiation fees you know. It was hard work initiating candidates and took a long time, so we needed refreshment, and no expense was spared. I've been a traveling man for many years and know something of the benefits of these secret orders. I've had to carry extra baggage more or less all the time, and all I had to do was to put my knightly sign on my extra baggage, call for it when I reached my destination, and when others would have to come up and pay for the transportation of their extra baggage, the agent would say to me, 'It's all right, sir,' and even forward it to my hotel, without its costing me a cent!"

Rev. R. Mink, United German Evangelical pastor at Ontarioville, invited me to his home. He said, "We have no secret society men here. I do not think lecturing will do any good, for we are all opposed to secret societies.

It was after dark when I knocked at the door of our tried friend, Alexander Thomson, at Bartlett, where I was warmly greeted and welcomed.

In the morning we obtained the consent of the trustees of the Congregational church to my lecturing in it. After the lecture, I went home with Dr. C. H. Guild, a life-long Anti-mason, and as he is, so are all his family.

I had the pleasure of meeting our County Secretary, Edgar Wylie, at the close of my lecture, also W. R. Hench, Esq., Mr. A. J. Lyon, and Mr. Malaney, along with Mr. Rufus Guild, all of whom are staunch Anti-masons, and possess the courage of their convictions. Bro. Thomson closed the services with a few trenchant remarks, and did not forget the collection.

Altogether, from the cordial reception, I had, and the friends to these principles whom I met, this town seems like an oasis in our reform. Bidding them all farewell, I went to the depot, where, while waiting for the train, the only saloonkeeper with which the place is cursed, came over and eyed me very closely. From his watch chain dangled a Masonic emblem, in perfect keeping with the business in which he is engaged.

"By their fruits ye shall know them."

At Wayne I met Newton Smith, Esq., who assured me the use of the Congregational church, as he is one of the trustees. He advised me to leave bills and on Sabbath he would have the announcement made. This I did, naming Tuesday evening, Oct. 27th.

THE SECRET EMPIRE.

THE ILLINOIS GRAND LODGE.

The meeting of this body October 6 to 8, in Chicago, though not strictly of an historical nature, yet furnishes some facts of enough importance to be put on record, and for want of other space they are printed here.

The lodge was presided over by John R. Thomas, of Metropolis, member of Congress from the Cairo district. John C. Smith, whom the Republicans have for lieutenant governor, was senior grand warden, and Rev. George W. Scawthorn did the chaplin's part. Grand Master Thomas having to attend Congress his deputy, A. T. Darrah, of Bloomington, was entrusted with the care of the order. The reports of these officers speak:

1. Of the "schools of instruction." As the "work" or ritual of the lodge is sworn not to be printed, etc., it is committed to manuscript which is entrusted to a committee, who have held meetings at Centralia, Litchfield, Sterling, Champaign, and Roekford to post the Masons in the lectures, oaths, dialogues, Hiram Abiff tragedy, etc. The G. M. says these "schools" have cost the Illinois Masons two cents per member, or $900, and have the effect to cure "inaccuraeies and blunders in the work" which have got into the lodges.

At these schools, says the report, the ritual alone is not all that is taught. Besides eultivating the social virtues, inspiring a zeal for the institution, and a determination to know more of the ritual and symbolism of the degrees, many other points of interest are taught and exemplified—such as for example: How the officers of the grand or constituent lodges should be received and introduced; how the examination of a visitor should be conducted; how and by whom he should be introduced; and many other points of interest to the craft generally. The interest in the schools was never before so marked as as during the past winter. The desire for information on the various points presented, and the interest manifested for more light were all that the most exacting could ask or expect. The board of examiners and assistant grand lecturers have, by a long course of study and teaching, become proficient in the work to a degree not contemplated a few years since. All these brethren deserve credit for faithful and efficient services rendered. To their efforts is largely due the advanced condition of the craft in Illinois."

It is worthy of remark that the "more light" these Masons sought for was how to make the signs of Masonic worship to the "worshipful" officers, how to catch a "book Mason," if one should appear, and similar most valuble information. Note also that the lecturers are memorizing their rituals as they did not expect to be compelled to a few years ago. Why? Because then printed books or cypher rituals were accessible to every Mason, and the agony of memorizing the stuff was not necessary. But when the best rituals began to be printed by Anti-masons and used with such terrible power against the order, the ritual business is closed out for the country masters.

2. The Grand lodge laid but two corner-stones last year, but these were both for court-houses—at Galesburg and Winchester. One other Masonic affair of this kind only took place in the State. This is a decline in the advertising patronage.

3. The Grand Master decided that "It is not lawful in this jurisdiction for a lodge to receive the petition for membership of a Mason holding a demit from a lodge working under the 'Grand Orient of Sorono,' Italy." So by this act Masonry ceases to be a "universal brotherhood." There have been other and more violent infractions of this humbug "brotherhood" rule.

4. Eight new lodges received their charters, and the charters of five were given up. Among the latter was the celebrated St. Andrew's Lodge No. 703, chartered in 1873, and which was a very select body indeed. Among its few members were T. T. Gurney, Past Grand Master; Vincent L. Hurlbut, Grand Commander of the Chicago Knight Templar conclave; E. B. Myers, the law-book publisher; J. H. McVicker, theatre manager; R. R. Donnelly, publisher, etc.

5. The total membership in 1884 was 39,963; in 1885 it was 40,015, a gain of 52. But it appears that 110 were added "for error" and 32 deducte l for same cause; that is, last year's report is corrected by adding 74, so that there were really 40,037 last year. The Illinois Masons number in 1885, from the report, therefore, 22 less than in 1884. A still greater loss appears if we take the items of increase: raised, reinstated and admitted, and compare with the items of loss: suspended, demitted, expelled and died, by which it appears that the latter are greater by 46. There were 1,559 who took the first degree; 1,424 made Master Masons; and 355 wanted to be initiated, but were refused.

—From a cheering letter by Rev. John Ross, translator of the New Testament into the Corean language, contained in the July Monthly Reporter of the British and Foreign Bible Society, we learn that as the result of Bible reading and the distribution of tracts and Testaments, there are besides those already baptized, over six hundred men, new applicants for baptism in the Corean valleys. As the result of the two years' labor of the colporteur Swi at the capital, he has now over seventy men who are applicants for baptism, some of them "remarkable men." One of his converts has opened a "preaching hall" in a city to the west of the capital, where he has eighteen believers, and another has over twenty applying for baptism in a city to the south. "The remarkable results" from the labors of the colporteurs, not in the Corean valleys only, but in Central and Southern Corea, seem to prove conclusively that this vernacular translation is just what was needed, being, "understood by all, including women and children." In Central Corea the majority of purchasers were women, who seemed to be literally "hungering and thirsting for the truth." And while a few learned men prefer the Chinese literary style, the vast majority of the men and all the women must depend on the vernacular translation for their Biblical instruction.—Foreign Missionary.

—Secret societyism has been agitating the institutions in the United States, the ecclesiastical, social and civil, so that it were well for people to make themselves better acquainted with the nature and workings of such fraternities. Possibly, it will be found on proper investigation that only three institutions, the domestic (the family), the ecclesiastical and the civil, have divine sanction and authority, as revealed in the Word of God. The multiplicity of societies unauthorized by divine revelation, must have a tendency to disparage and sap these divinely constituted institutions.—Our Church Paper, organ of the Tennessee Lutheran Synod.

—Detachments of the Salvation Army have found their way to the Tibetan border; but, to their great astonishment, they have been able to make no impression whatever on the people. Their drums were beat in vain, and their dress of saffron yellow, the sacred color of the Buddhists, attracted no attention to them. They visited a monastery, but the monks would not interrupt their litanies to greet them.

—The late meeting of the American Board at Boston was more largely attended than perhaps any former meeting of that body. Tremont Temple overflowed into Music Hall and other buildings. The crowd in front of Tremont Temple was so immense as to impede travel for half an hour, and the police were called out to clear the street.

—"Grand Keeper of Records and Seals" Pillsbury of the Knights of Pythias of New Hampshire reports for l past year: "Total receipts of subordinate lodges, 643.85; decrease during the year, $1,555.49; total expen tures, $9,708.53; increase, $234.81; total amount paid for relief, $3,504 58; decrease, $280 29.

CORRESPONDENCE.

BRO E. MATHEWS' STATEMENT.

Dear Cynosure Friends:—Our feelings of interest in you as "workers together with God" against systems that "love darkness rather than light," prompt this article. The trouble into which my utterances against all orders demanding an oath, affirmation, or promise of secrecy, as a condition of membership, precipitated me July 4, 5 and 6, 1885, has just ended. Wednesday, Oct. 21, I decided to let Judge Pealer sentence me, and finding that less money was demanded to pay fine and costs, than to get the case through the Supreme Court, and that the many friends East, West, North and South, among whom I have gone lecturing and preaching for these sixteen years failed to respond as they might, and I think should, to the call through the Cynosure; therefore I borrowed on thirty days' time $110 and paid in full, taking receipt therefor of the clerk. The knowledge of the lodge power in our courts of justice, gained through my trial has put a bludgeon in my hand with which I expect to deal some stunning blows on the head of the Beast ere long. It is expected that I assist Bro. Stoddard at Columbus, Ohio, in December, and now let me repeat a former statement made through the Cynosure in July last: "I am ready to go anywhere in the States, or Canada, my expenses being guaranteed, to shed light on this important question."

I am prepared to speak in doors or out, gathering my own congregations as hitherto in Michigan, New York, Illinois, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, and round about. It is true, I am chairman of districts in Free Methodist church, but be it known that the gist of the whole matter is in the question: "Will you keep yourself free to follow the will of God in all things?" I answered, Yes, when joining the church of my choice ten years ago, and I say, Yes, to-day.

Who will send immediately to Cynosure office a dollar, less or more, toward paying my note which is due on or before Nov. 21, 1885? Your Bro.

THE LODGE ASSASSINS AT MEMPHIS.

LETTER FROM BRO. COUNTEE.

Memphis, Tenn., Oct. 19, 1885.

Editor Christian Cynosure,

Dear Sir:—I was somewhat surprised to see in your issue of Thursday last an appeal for aid to assist us here in erecting a parsonage; first, a letter from me to Rev. Callender, and second, one from him to the readers of the Cynosure. You have no doubt learned through the dispatches of the Associated Press of a second attempt to take my life, last night, Sunday, Oct. 18, 1885. The particulars I submit to you.

After preaching, in company with about twenty-five of the members of my church (Tabernacle Baptist) I proceeded to my home, nearly a mile away, in the southern suburbs of the city. We had enjoyed a good meeting all day. The Spirit of the Lord attended us, and our hearts were filled with gladness and our lips with praise.

Thus we wended our way, and when within a quarter of a mile of my house, and entering the most dangerous part of our journey, I was suddenly alarmed by the snapping of a cap, and immediately a volley of buckshot was poured into our midst, five of the shot taking effect. I received two shots, one in my chin glancing and coming out under my right jaw. The second shot was right in the back of my head, and fortunately did not penetrate the cranium.

My brother, a young man of 25 years, was shot in the chin, the ball glancing downward and coming out, leaving an ugly wound. Another one lodged in his shoulder, the ball ranging toward the spine, which at this writing remains in him. The third person was a Mrs. Ellen Wright, who received a ball in the hip which cannot be extracted.

Our wounds are all very painful, and excitement is now at fever heat. We saw the men as they emerged from their ambush and ran swiftly down the street. In their flight they left their gun behind, an old-fashioned, muzzle-loading, double-barrelled shot-gun.

And now by grace I am once again saved from the power of the enemy, for how long I cannot tell. It becomes more apparent that I must have a house in town, and how to build is a question. We are all poor and have no money, and I now ask every one who may perchance read this article to help us, no matter how small may be the amount. Trusting God may open the hearts of all Christians, that while we wrestle with the power of Baal they will help and encourage us. We want to commence our house at once, and we can only lean on the strong arm of the Omnipotent and the benevolence of a Christian people everywhere. May God inspire every heart to lend us a helping hand, and any amount forwarded will be thankfully received and prayerfully acknowledged. Yours in much tribulation,

R. N. Countee.

THE LODGE AND ITS CO-PARTNERS IN ST. PAUL.

St. Paul, Minn., Oct. 15, 1885.

Editor Christian Cynosure:—The secretists laid the corner-stone of the court house on Tuesday last, the 13th inst. It was gratifying to notice the almost total absence from that performance of the better class of citizens. A very few of the city officials were present, and some of them are Masons, but, whether from fear or shame I know not, they wore nothing on their persons to indicate any alliance with the "cut-throat" performers of their spiritual jugglery over the corner-stone before them. Both the mayor and the postmaster took part in the exercises, as members of the court house commission; and, although both are Masons, they wore no badges or regalia.

Except for the terrible disgrace entailed upon the city, I am rather glad that the Masons laid the stone, because, besides exposing Masonry to the contempt of all true citizens, it has revealed the fact of a deep-seated antipathy to that order. Previous to this event all the city papers absolutely refused to print anything that I could write upon the subject, but now the popular feeling is such that they can treat the Masons somewhat slightingly. Our mayor pleaded that the Masons were "the only world builders," and that the ancient custom of laying corner-stones by Freemasons should be observed on the present occasion.

The mayor is one of the oldest and most popular citizens of St. Paul. As soon as he had accepted his nomination for the office of mayor, everybody knew he would be elected. Then all the rumsellers, harlots, gamblers and blacklegs of this city, and some in other cities, were jubilant over their future prospects of a rich harvest in their respective professions. The keepers of houses of infamy and the gamblers at once made preparation to return to the city and reopen their business with the public on a grand scale; and as soon as the inauguration had taken place the houses of infamy were ready for business and public receptions were given in them. Some of the more decent sort of citizens protested against such houses being located in their immediate vicinity. The gamblers opened their establishments, and one of the most notorious blacklegs in the country, being called away from the city for a season on account of illness in his family, called at the mayor's office, took his hand and bade him an affectionate farewell for a season. The merchants saw that their money drawers were not safe from the pilfering fingers of their clerks while the gamblers' dens were so easily accessible and so popular by reason of the mayor's "wide open policy." This merchants' danger reacted upon the newspapers, hence the newspapers fought against the mayor's "policy," and the grand jury has just driven off the gamblers with a light fine. Our late mayor, Mr. O'Brien, had insisted upon enforcing the laws against bad houses, in consequence of which we had a fair degree of outward decency, at least. But during the last summer the city has looked towards Sodom as I have not known it to do before.

I trust that the time will come when the churches will be ashamed of their policy. It will not come, however, until the popular sentiment of the world demands the suppression of the secret lodge system now supported by the churches. And when all of the gambling houses, houses of infamy, secret lodges and saloons are abolished, we shall not have then, necessarily, reached the seat of war. All of that infamy proceeds out of the heart. "The friendship of the world is enmity with God." James 4: 4. The Gospel of Christ saves a man from the Masonic penalty after he has broken his obligation that binds his soul to Satan and the lodge. But while there are elders, deacons, and members of churches bowed by those obligations we must suppose that the pastors of those churches do not know the Gospel of Christ: their Gospel is a spurious Gospel and their Christ a false Christ: else they would not be afraid to offer it to lost Masons in their churches, by proclaiming the sin of Masonry and other secret lodge devil-worships in the faces of those lost church members until they were either saved or driven out of the churches by the glory of Christ.

Let there be a fair test of the power of the Gospel a man preaches, and not as the seminary students used to say, "We know that the revelations of Masonry are true, but we must not mention the subject to the churches or they will not hear us; and if they did hear us we should divide them." Such preachers know little of Christ. Probably if asked their opinion of Masonry they would lie by saying they know nothing about it. That lie will satisfy a Mason so as to make him easy under the gaze of that preacher. The devil knows that Christ is not with that minister, and therefore does not fear him.

The true Gospel will be sure to proclaim the sin of Masonry in the faces of Masons, and that Gospel would take many a minister out of his fine pulpit and rich living and make him a humble follower of Jesus, the lowly man of Nazareth, making him a partaker of the sufferings of Christ. How much better that would be than for him to retain his fine position and rich living and bye and bye "lift up his eyes in hell tormented in the flame." In torment not only from the flame but from the mocking of lost Masons who went to hell under his false Gospel.

The writer of the epistle to the Hebrews said, "Let us go forth to Him without the camp, bearing His reproach." Heb. 13: 13. That Scripture may find an application to-day. If I understand it the Garrisons and the Phillips had to stand outside of the churches while they drove or shamed slavery and the principles of slavery out of the churches. And so it seems that if true Anti-masons do not get out of the churches they will be put out. And when out they must either fight for truth and righteousness or lose their own souls. A pastor of a church once asked the writer if he would help Ronayne work the Masonic degrees in public at a certain place, who, when asked if he would assist in the same, replied, "No, I cannot, for I am pastor of a church there;" but to the writer he said, "you can, because you are not a pastor, and therefore loose-footed."

Surely in eternity there will be a multitude of Freemasons cursing their cowardly pastors who, to get their approbation and their money, flattered them into hell. W. FENTON.

METHODIST NEGLECT OF THE POOR.

At the Local Preachers' Convention, in Brooklyn, N. Y., Mr. J. A. Richards, of Orange, N. J., showed, most seriously, in his address, the great need of local or free preaching for the poor; and that for want of this the church of the Wesleys would soon "lose its grip" on this class of people.

This warning comes too late. For many years back, strong efforts have been made to squelch out free preaching, in New England especially, till very few local preachers are here found in the denomination. The secret is, the drones want support as "professors" in "literary institutions;" and the way to get that support is to increase the number of these "institutions;" and the way to do that, is to compel every young preacher to patronize them! Well, that puts him into debt for his education; so they have to procure all the pay-preaching they can for these graduates, in order to pay their bills. And in order to do this, they make every small congregation—no matter how small—pay a "salary." What would John Wesley say to this sponging process on poor people? I have seen a good deal of this in different places of late years. How much need there is of a Moody church! AN OLD METHODIST.

HIS CONFESSION OF FAITH.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN CYNOSURE:—How can a man outside of the lodge glory in the cross of Christ declaring "I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord," and while inside change "the truth of God into a lie?" Will not God in the judgment declare the latter as the man's confession of faith? That link in the chain will not stand the test; that corner-stone in the foundation will ruin forever the whole superstructure the man is building. Christ said, "He that is not with me," always and everywhere, "is against me," always and everywhere.

LESSON VI. Nov. 8, 1885.—The story of Jonah. Jonah 1: 1-17.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Arise, go to Nineveh, that great city and cry against it. Jonah 1: 2.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

COMMENTS ON THE LESSON BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. The folly of trying to flee from God's presence. vs. 1–4. Any one who tries to drown the voice of duty in his soul by plunging into business or pleasure is trying to flee from the presence of the Lord. Perhaps, like Jonah's, the attempt will seem to succeed for a time but it will be found in the end that the path of wilful disobedience is not the path to true peace. Jonah, however, is more especially a warning to faithless ministers who refuse to deliver God's message;—who forget that their mission is not simply to present the Gospel, as so many seem to fancy, but to cry against those particular sins which prevent men from accepting it. The display of rich and fashionable dress in the house of God; that spirit of pride and exclusiveness which keeps the masses away from the sanctuary, and delivers them over to the grasp of infidelity is surely a terrible sin, yet how seldom is it preached against! The greatest revivalists, from Chrysostom to Savanarola, and from Savanarola to Luther, have always thundered against sin,—not sin in the abstract, but the particular individual sins of their individual hearers. And there must be a revival of this same pungent, personal preaching before there can be any genuine or lasting work of grace in the churches. Those pastors who see that secret societies are taking the money, the membership, the zeal, and the very life of the church, yet utter no warning cry against it, commit the sin of Johah; for the very fact that their eyes have been opened to see that Masonry is a sin, is in itself a command from God unto them to cry against the Nineveh of the lodge.

2. Our sin is sure to find us out. vs. 5–17. Jonah's manly, straightforward confession proves that for all his disobedience he was at heart loyal to God. On the other hand we see much to admire in the conduct of the seamen. They believe, each in his tutelary deity, they are full of heathen superstitions; yet their unwillingness to sacrifice Jonah, their blind groping after some surer stay in their distress and terror, the evident sincerity and depth of their conversion prove that all nations are indeed of one blood. God, by making Jonah an involuntary missionary to them, may have meant to take the first step in humbling his Jewish pride which could not brook the thought of divine mercy being extended to Gentiles. The most degraded savage bears in his bosom the priceless jewel of an immortal soul. How long before Christians arouse and possess the world for Christ?

LIGHT FROM THE WORD.

Can we ever flee from God's presence? Ps. 139: 8. Where are we given an epitome of ministerial duty? Ez. 33: 1–16.

"To flee." That is to make haste. The only instance of a prophet concealing his message. Explanations vary: (1) the long and dangerous journey (600 miles); (2) a dread of the cruel Gentile city; (3) unwillingness to carry a message of love outside his own nation.—Geikie; (4) Nineveh beneath his notice (Acts 10: 14); (5) his own reputation.—Abbott; (6) holy zeal for God's honor, fear lest by sparing Nineveh after unmitigated threatening, God be regarded as changeable.—Martin; (7) as the Assyrian inscriptions state, Nineveh had already made war upon Israel, and as Jonah may have known, was destined to conquer it (Hosea 9: 3; 11: 5). Commanded to call to repentance the country by which his own people—nay, the people of God—were to be carried captive, he rebelled.—Pusey.

"Unto Tarshish." Probably Tartessus, a Phœnician port in southern Spain. Sent to the extreme north east, he hastened to the furthermost west.

"From the presence of the Lord." He did not expect to hide from God (Ps. 139), who, as he told the sailors, made the sea and the dry land Going out of the king's presence, said of one retiring from office, does not mean going from under his law.—Raleigh. Supposing, in common with his countrymen, that the spirit of prophecy was confined to the land of Israel, he hoped to escape from its inspiring influences by flying into a foreign country.—Payson.

"Cried every man unto his god." He that would learn to pray, let him go to sea.—Matthew Henry.

"And was fast asleep." The sleep, not of heartlessness, but of heavy-heartedness.—Chrysostom. Drowned in stupor and stupid insecurity.—Jerome. In careless self-security.—Keil. Our Lord's sleep (Mark 4: 38) furnishes at once a comparison and a contrast.

"Arise, call upon thy God." This address of the ship-master is equally applicable to you who are yet in your natural, unregenerate state, for your situation is far more dreadful and alarming than Jonah's. Like him, you are exposed to the storm of divine wrath, which every moment pursues and threatens to overtake you; like him, you are asleep, and insensible of your danger.—Payson.

"The lot fell upon Jonah." One might see in the scene a terrible tribunal, for the ship was the court of justice, the judges were the sailors, the executioners were the winds, the prisoner at the bar was the prophet, the house of correction and prison of safe keeping was the whale, and the accuser was the angry sea.—Kalisch.

"Why hast thou done this?" The inconsistency of believers is the marvel of the young Christian, the hardening of the unbeliever. Faith without love, knowledge without obedience, conscious dependence and yet rebellion, are the strangest marvels in this mysterious world.—Pusey.

"A great fish." The Greek of the Septuagint, which our Lord quoted (Matt. 12: 40), is a generic term applying to any great fish. It was not a whale, which is exceedingly rare in the Mediteranean, but a shark or sea-dog. We have it on authority of Couch, Darwin, and others, that the formation of the jaws and throat renders it easy for the white shark (carcharias vulgaris, sometimes 36 feet long), to swallow enormous objects, and that they not unfrequently cast up their prey whole and alive. Blumenbach mentions a whole horse found in one; Ruysch, a man in armor; and Dr. Baird, of the British Museum, saw one swallow a bullock's head and horns. Entire men have been found in the stomachs of these creatures.—Dr. Crosby.

—The Kansas City car drivers are being discharged for belonging to the Knights of Labor.

—Returns made to the Japanese Government show 80,000 Christians in that empire.

—The right of suffrage has been granted to women by the municipal authorities of Madrid.

—The Vermont Chronicle, an old and influential religious paper, has a very able article against secret societies and sectarianism.

—The order of Sons of Temperance was instituted in New York City by eight Freemasons and eight Odd-fellows. Was temperance or lodgism the leading thought?

OBITUARY.

Mrs. Laura C. Whitcomb died suddenly at her home in Bloomington, Ill., Oct. 9th, 1885. She was regarded with the highest esteem in the city, being an earnest and influential worker in the Christian church and Christian reform, especially the temperance cause.

Bloomington, Ill., Oct. 16, 1885.

Dear Cynosure:—As I have noticed frequent obituary notices in my paper, I conclude it is your custom to thus apprise the dear friends of our reform of those of our number who will appear with us no more. My dear wife is gone, and although few of your readers knew her personally, yet in connection with the Master's cause they have enjoyed her sympathies, her prayers, and her labors for many years.

Her birthplace was historic ground in connection with the Morgan tragedy (Middleport, Niagara county, New York), and my hope is that this may fall under the eyes of some old friends in that region. If so, a card of recognition from them through the mail would be received by the undersigned with grateful pleasure. Her memory was stored with much history immediately subsequent to the murder of Morgan, and I believe she was under promise to Bro. Stoddard to write it out for the columns of the Cynosure.

Among the incidents were the deathbed horrors endured by one of the actual participants who drove the fatal carriage which conveyed him to his doom. The house of this wretched man stood near the canal and the croaking of the frogs could be heard in his room. Conscience exaggerated these innocent sounds into doleful reproaches uttered in a sing-song manner and tone, thus: "Old —, —, carrid off Morgan, old —, —, carrid off Morgan, carried off Morgan," over and over.

My wife was born in 1825, at Middleport, Niagara county, New York. Her maiden name was Laura C. Hurd. Eldest daughter of Dr. Eli Hurd, a well known physician of that place, having a quite extensive family connection of that name. She was a graduate of the Phipps Union Seminary of Albion, Orleans county, New York. She came West in 1850 and engaged in teaching. She formed my acquaintance at Mt. Palatine, Putnam county, Illinois. We both professed religion and were married March 1st, 1851, beginning a wedlock commended to God.

She was of a tender, sympathetic nature, and by God's grace was enabled to accomplish much good in a modest way among the poor and suffering around her. She always took an active and laborious part in church, Sunday school and open temperance circles, About fifteen years ago she received an accidental wound which hindered her public usefulnesss, and she has been slowly failing ever since.

She had warnings of apoplexy for some time and was calmly and beautifully prepared. As she had desired, she calmly fell asleep and is now laid in a spot she had designated a "restful place." It was a blessed end of a useful life. Her fully developed Christian character will appear in the white robed throng described in Rev. 7: 9, which was the theme of her funeral discourse. She has left a family of five children, all grown and professors of religion—three sons business men of Chicago, and two daughters, one a teacher and the other an artist, This surely is a visible fruit of her worthy life and example.

During our bereavement and sorrow we have received the most thoughtful and sincere sympathy and attention from kind-hearted neighbors and friends. This although we have never joined any secret or benefit association or paid dues to buy kind offices at such a time as this. "She was our best friend," said they, and their services were from the heart and not in obedience to previously taken fraternal obligations. From your unworthy brother, H. D Whitcomb.

AMERICAN PLATFORM.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled condition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clannishness by which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile bands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruption, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; and having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and believing the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, both inevitable and indispensable:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, believing with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; believing in the Christian marriage, and not in Mormonism; believing in the religious democracy of the New Testament, and not in the despotism of the lodge; believing, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, not in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we abhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscienee by human laws and penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly believe that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike foes to human liberty and welfare. We further most firmly believe that a government without God has none but lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a mere usurpation, we regard all religions and worships invented by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as mere swindling impositions and cheats. We believe in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly believe that the bravery and blood of our soldiers have bought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will be just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised by the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon be not only echoed by their voices, but sustained by their votes.

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following. as containing a brief synopsis of the principles of our government, by which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.
2. That the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.
3. That God requires, and man needs a Sabbath.
4. We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.
5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.
6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to benefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.
7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punishment of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.
8. We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage.
9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be preserved inviolate, and the same equality should be extended to Indians and Chinamen.
10. That international differenees should be settled by arbitration.
11. That laud and other monopolies should be discouraged.
12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.
13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.
14. That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.
15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

J. BLANCHARD. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

CHICAGO, TUESDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1885.

Adam Crooks.—What memories thrill the soul at mention of that name! A fine portrait and sketch is promised of this noble reformer in our issue of November 12th; but Adam Crooks was so well and widely known, and not alone in the bounds of his own denomination, that we are confident that hundreds would be glad of the opportunity to add their tribute to the record of a good man. The friends who read this notice are, therefore, invited and requested to send in their own personal recollections of Adam Crooks, or procure such communications from as many as they can. As the time is short, act promptly and write without delay. Letters must reach the editor by Friday, November 6th, to be sure of insertion.

Prayer without ceasing was offered by the church while Peter was in prison. Brinkley and Countee in Memphis need prayer no less than that apostle did.

M. N. Butler of Missouri, has been appointed agent for the American party. Mr. Butler has done good work for American principles against the despotism of the lodge in the State of Missouri and adjacent States.

The Prohibition press begins to denounce secret political orders when they favor liquor. Are they any better in the shape of Good Templar lodges? How many Good Templars voted for St. John?

Mary Allen West was elected, at Jacksonville, President of the Illinois W. C. T. U., which the Advance handsomely notices; and both the Signal and the Advance are sharp on Judith Ellen Foster for opposing the Prohibition party. To be consistent, these papers should condemn those Good Templars who, pretending prohibition, plot and vote against the Prohibition party.

The study of the Bible has increased an hundred fold within the past few years in some branches of the church. This is a bright "sign of the times." But it is melancholy that mammoth sheets called religious, furnish reams of printed matter which have little to do with the Bible or religion; utterly unfit for Sabbath reading.

Calomel and Novels.—The ablest medical practioners say that the general use of calomel, while calomel was the fashion, affected the physical constitution of the masses, who became what was called "Calomel patients," on whom other and ordinary remedies lost their power. Novel reading seems to have an analogous effect. A novel at best is but a well told lie, and, like the lie, has its uses, especially in time of war. But the universal and perpetual habit of reading fiction destroys the ordinary effect of truth, and confounds the distinction between true stories and false. And close observers think this mental damage descends to children of the present day, so that their facts are, not indeed willful lies, but "works of imagination."

"Providence permits dreffle things," said Aunt Chloe in "Uncle Tom." One of the ablest lecturers in the world said to the Cynosure editor lately, "The difficulty lies not in want of argument, but in getting the secret lodge system before the mind of the American people." One almost wishes that Providence would permit the Masons to do some "dreffle things" as Aunt Chloe says. Once on the anvil of popular discussion that fearful system will be easily hammered to death." This great popular lecturer who has not committed himself against the lodge before the public, is just the man to handle such a subject; and the lodge system is the very subject for such a mind to handle. The late shooting of three persons, by procurement of the lodge, and the murder of a "Chinese Morgan" for revealing lodge secrets in Portland, Oregon, would seem to be things "dreffle" enough to waken a people not hopelessly drugged.

—The meeting in the Second German Baptist church last Wednesday, addressed by Pres. C. A. Blanchard was a very excellent and successful one.

THE AMERICAN BOARD.

This Board has just held its seventy-fifth anniversary. It is a stupendous body, a pride and ornament of mankind. It originated in a prayer meeting behind a haystack, held by four poor young men. It was a brave attempt to Christianize our entire globe, and its history makes boasting harmless in the few old men who have been with it from the first. It has received and expended for its work more than twenty millions of dollars without a defaulter; and its credit has equalled in extent around the globe, and its paper has been relied on as implicitly as that of Rothschild or the Barings. It has stood firmly and kept its identity and even the form of its close corporation, while leading European monarchies have been turned into republics, and back again to monarchies. It has colonized and sent off the Old and New School Presbyterians, then the Dutch Reformed; but the loss of these great bodies, taking more churches than they left, has not shaken the original organization. Since its birth, steamboats have reconstructed navigation, and steam prints and pumps and drives the workshops, and carries the commerce of the world. The sun has taken to making pictures, and electricity to talking across continents and seas; and has broken fetters by millions, and reconstructed States and bankrupted one-half of our continent.

"Grim-visaged war"

But the American Board, a mere popular voluntary scheme, with no power but reason, and no force but argument, has kept a steady inflowing revenue for three-quarters of a century, and is out of debt in its seventy-fifth year with a balance in its treasury. And in all these social, moral, philosophical cyclones its orthodoxy has been such that Wickliffe, John Knox and the Lutheran reformers would have felt themselves at home in it.

We are sorry that there is another side.

In 1845, this great Board voted that slave-holding should be no bar to church membership; and in the hearing of the writer, the good Dr. Hopkins, who is now its president, ridiculed the Free Soil infant which became the Republican party, as "Free Dirt;" though at the Boston meeting, week before last, the Doctor deigned to enumerate the fall of slavery by Free Soil votes, as one of the moral wonders in which he had seen, with no sneer at the means by which it fell, and no hint that he had stood in the way of its overthrow. In 1848, in Tremont Temple, Boston, the senior editor of the Cynosure offered a resolution "That, Slave-holding is a practice which is not to be continued in the Christian church." This resolution was negatived by a unanimous "No!" by this venerable Board. That is to say, the Board voted that slave-holding was a practice to be continued in the churches of Christ, whose members of course were to own each other as property. Thus giving its great power to crush those of us who objected to propagate a slave-holding Christianity. The above resolution may be read in the Board's minutes of 1848. As the board has planted churches around our globe, and as secret lodges of sworn Satan-worships and murder-penalties for revealing them have been started as counterfeit religions equally world-wide, let us hope that this church-planting body will not include and endorse devil-worship along with the worship of Christ, to win the favor of the world of which Satan is the god.

Joseph Cook addressed, by invitation, the Boston meeting. He said, in his heavy-metal, characteristic address: "I am ready to be hospitable to new truths." "I believe that in the last age of the universe the kingdom of redemption shall be as an ocean of light; and that the kingdom of the lost will be only a speck of darkness in the midst of it." The whole anti-secret reform dwells in the mechanism and make-up of Mr. Cook's mind. Even the patriarch conservative, Dr. Hopkins, in his charming speech said that the obstacles to the world's conversion to Christ, though seeming to be many, are but one: "Something called religion, and substituted for holiness, has been and is among the greatest obstacles to the spread of Christianity;" and the Doctor went on enumerating false religions till one wonders how he could miss the secret, sworn lodge system which enwraps our globe like a poison shirt of Nessus. Dr. Hopkins has learning. Has he not read in Cudworth that Satan is captain against Christ; and in Bishop Warburton, that "every heathen god had his secret worship to which only the initiated could enter." Let us hope this good man may live to speak of the lodge as he now speaks of slavery.

Salmon P. Chase, in his first abolition speech to a handful of us in a little church near Cincinnati, said: "This cause must and will succeed. And when our country is saved by its triumph, will it irk us, think you, that we have borne the burden and heat of the struggle its triumph is to cost?"

THE SOUTH.

We call special attention to the letter of Rev. Mr. Imes, Congregational pastor in Memphis, Tenn., under the care of the American Missionary Association. It is an exceedingly able document, written in an eminently Christian temper.

If the American Missionary Association, from the time when they first began to plant churches had seen, as Bro. Imes now sees, the utter impossibility of building up two kinds of religion, Christian and Christless, in the same churches, and refused to allow the fellowship of "light with darkness," its growth might have been slower, but it would have escaped placing its ministers in the dilemma where they now are. If now, Bro. Imes should exclude Freemasons from his church, he would be arraigned as a fanatic, and proved to be so, because they would say, the American Missionary Association which founded and supports the church takes no such ground. Bro. Imes is thus between the upper and nether millstones. If he excludes the lodge, he censures the American Missionary Association by going beyond their orders; and if he receives the lodge, it will suck the life out of his church. He must therefore condemn the lodge and fellowship Masons. Thus he is in a strait betwixt two, like Mr. Lincoln "saving the Union with slavery," which was dissolving it.

But "wisdom is profitable to direct;" and as one cannot mend an old shoe on the same principle on which he can make one out of new leather, he acts wisely to do the best he can in the circumstances. But this Memphis business is making clear what Paul said eighteen hundred years ago, that Christ has no concord with Baal, neither light with darkness. Christians who belong to lodges are objects of compassion. Nobody tells them it is a sin to belong to a lodge and practice its human worships, and they see Masons whose general good behavior equals or exceeds that of many Anti-masons; and when they are told that the lodge takes time and money which belongs to the church, they feel injured and affronted. "What business," say they, "has the church to take away my liberty to join what associations I please?" And the church has no business to dictate in the matter if the practice of Christless worship is not sin. But if Masonry is idolatry practiced in Christian countries; if there is only "One God and one Mediator between God and man;" if worshiping God with none, or with false, man-contrived mediators, actually and literally divorces men from the only God; and if such comings to God are rushing upon the bosses of his buckler, as the horse into battle, then every man who has a soul to save, "a God to glorify," a sin to blot out, a government to maintain, or a shilling of property to be guarded by his neighbor's oath; every man, in short, who wishes safety here and salvation hereafter, has a right to protest against a Masonic lodge as an egg of treason against God and man. Masonry was what Washington meant by organizations formed to influence government yet not amenable to law, and which take away "the sanctity of the oath."

If now there can be a national congress of churches to consider what is the worship of the true God, and whether counterfeit worships, meeting by night within tyled doors, under death penalties not to reveal what is said and done, are to be allowed in churches, our country may be saved from the "wrath to the uttermost," which fell on the dead idolatrous nations.

There can be but one result come from such a congress of churches. The lodge has no argument. It lives by a hoodwink. It is "speechless," like the fool in the parable who might have had the wedding garment but would not put it on. The United States population outside of lodges are opposed to them, as a conspiracy against the world of outsiders. But the sects become cities of refuge for the lodges and force each other to receive them. Let then the Gospel denominations meet in convention, and vote as Israel did at the fall of the fire: "Jehovah he is the God." But, above all, since the age is come, when, not only here and there are Elijahs, but the "sons and daughters" of the church "prophesy," let us "restore the altar of the Lord which is fallen down," and we shall find him still "Mighty to save."

—Brother E. Mathews gives us elsewhere the conclusion of his trial. Read it and lay the Golden Rule alongside it.

—Bro. Bancroft, the Wisconsin agent, has recovered his health and is again in the field, with headquarters at Waukesha, where the State convention is appointed next month. Stand by him, brethren.

—The Living Way, the weekly paper issued by brethren Brinkley and Countee, at Memphis, is $2 per year, not $1.50 as lately noticed. The lodges now propose to "boycott" this paper for its independent exposure of their wickedness. All who are opposed to this show your hands with $2.

—Rev. R. N. Countee's letter, written the day after the last attempt at assassination, will be read with deepest interest. All the wounded persons, we learn from a late source, are doing well and out of danger. We repeat the call of last week for an earnest and generous response to this appeal for help. A meeting is projected in Wheaton to discuss the Southern question next Friday evening, to be addressed by Rev. C. S. Harris, of Jackson, Miss.

—The Prohibition committee of Cedar county, Iowa, Bro. John Dorcas reports to be clean of the lodge and in favor of open work. Let all such Prohibition committees be reported; and by all means let us secure others so far as possible. When the local bodies are right the party will be right—Americanized. Look out for the pennies; the dollars will take care of themselves.

—Martin J. Englund, of Philadelphia, Pa., has translated "In the Coils," in an abridged form, into the Swedish language. It has been published in a newspaper and then in permanent form. It is published by the Augustana publishing house at Rock Island. Mr. Mine, a teacher and missionary, now living at Fowler, Indiana, is about to translate the same work into Norwegian.

—The Industrial Press of Galena, Ill., says: "The Christian Cynosure, of Chicago, is the organ of anti-secret societies, and is cranky enough to suit all those crooked sticks that find it impossible to lie still from very crookedness." Thanks for the compliment to the noble Cynosure constituency. They are "cranky," made to turn something; and they are too crooked to lie still—well may the lodge fear such reformers. Let unceasing activity for the honor of our Lord Jesus Christ more and more inspire us all, brethren.

—One of our most popular reform writers gives the keynote to a thousand of our friends in a recent letter: "In Miss Martineau's Autobiography I was much interested in her "Rules for Writing," adopted before she lost her early faith,—so much so that I have adopted them for mine, one in particular, "To strive earnestly to serve my day and generation." I know no better way for me to carry out this rule than in writing for a paper like the Cynosure whose work is so manifestly blessed of God." Let such a devotion possess all hearts, and as another year closes we shall rejoice in the wonderful work the Lord has performed for his name and truth's sake.

PERSONAL MENTION.

—A daughter of Rev. John G. Fee is very low with consumption.

—Rev. Halleck Floyd, agent of Hartsville College, Indiana, has raised about three thousand dollars for the institution.

—Bishop Milton Wright, former editor of the Telescope and of the Richmond Star, is now located in Oregon. He reached San Francisco on the 11th inst. on his way to the United Brethren churches of California.

—Old Father Catterlin, ninety-seven years old, and blind, is a saint whom God allows to linger long on this side Jordan. He lives with his daughter, Mrs. Harry Thompson, in Abilene, Kansas. He remembers Brother E. Mathews with a gift of $5.

—Rev. W. O. Tobey, who resided at Chambersburg, Pa., preaching part of the time in the independent United Brethren church, has removed with his family to White Pigeon, Mich., from which place he has received and accepted a call to take charge of a Dutch Reformed congregation.

—Rev. E. Y. Garrette of Paxton, Ill., whose address before the Society of Inquiry of Wheaton College last commencement will not soon be forgotten by those who listened delighted with it, has gone to California for a few weeks.

—Rev Woodruff Post, whom thousands of our readers will remember for his faithfulness to the truth although standing almost alone in the Genessee Methodist Episcopal conference, has lately removed to Allegany, Cattaraugus county. He holds fast to his faith, though sorely beset at times by lodge influences.

—Elder J. L. Barlow though suffering for several weeks from a severe sprain continues his work as pastor of the Baptist church in Wheaton. The increase of interest in the Sabbath services and especially in the prayer-meetings is very encouraging. Monday he read a paper on "Immortality" before the conference of Baptist ministers in this city.

—Pres. L. N. Stratton of Wheaton Theological Seminary, while rejoicing in the evidences of the usefulness of his work in a large increase in the number of his students, has yet to regret that a painful illness has not permitted him to begin the year so vigorously with them as he would desire. He is now recovering and hopes to be at full strength again in a few days.

—Rev. John Kemp, whose death at Dayton, Ohio, a few years since was mourned not only by friends in that city, but by fellow reformers throughout the country, has left a worthy representative in S. E. Kemp of Dayton, who was in the late Ohio election chosen State Senator by the people of Montgomery and Preble counties against a popular opponent and a political party majority. He was supported by the best citizens of this city, in which he had a large majority, running much in advance of his ticket. The canvass in the interest of his election was conducted on a high plane and won him many supporters.

LETTER FROM GREECE.

Andros, Greece, Via Syra, Sept. 26, 1885.

Dear Bro. K.:—In my last letter I said to you that I would say something about Bro. Filian, the missionary of your Society. I heard him preach in the Bible House in Constantinople for the first time. There we met each other and I introduced myself to him. He was very glad to see me and I to see him, for we had heard about each other.

Mr. Filian has married the neice of Mr. Minasian who resides in America. She is a very intelligent lady and speaks several languages. She seems a good Christian lady and devoted to the work, and is ready to follow her husband to any field he goes. He lives with his father-in-law for the present, and as I spent a night with them I had a chance to get acquainted with all the family. The brother of his wife studied medicine in New York.

Mr. Filian has a power in preaching and the people love him and he draws a good audience. In our talk I said to him that there is hope that he will do a great deal of good if he will not let pride or any worldly thing come in and destroy all his efforts for good. He had all the means and the opportunity in America to learn how to do good, and also being connected with Wheaton, he learned many things which he could not learn anywhere else in America. So he had all the opportunities to learn to do good, and now if he does not do good it will be because he does not want to. There were four places where they wanted him to go; but I have had so much to do that I have not corresponded with him and so do not know where he went.

Now I must say something about Turkey. Since the close of the war between Turkey and Russia there has been great poverty in the Turkish Empire. Everything is cheaper than anywhere else, but there is no money in the hands of the people to buy. That last war was a destruction and a calamity for the Turkish nation. All the servants of the king and many officers, as I was informed, are waiting indefinitely for their wages, getting only their board and a little money to buy clothes with. The soldiers have many years to receive any pay. And it is very unfortunate that there is another war coming which will involve that nation in a war with Bulgaria. We saw in the newspapers two days ago that Bulgaria has rebeled against Turkey and begins to take places from Turkey. If this war goes on, not only Turkey but Greece has to go into the war. The Greek king has been telegraphed to reach the capital as soon as possible, and congress has been called to meet before its time. We spoke of the misery which a war will cause in Turkey, but it will cause no less misery in Greece.

It is terrible how much sickness there is in this part of the world this year. Not only in the cities but even in these healthy islands there is a great deal of sickness. After I had so much to do looking after the building of our house, I had also to run here and there to visit the sick. Your brother in Christ, A. D. Zaraphonithes.

—Grand Secretary Ross gives 532,467 as the number of Odd-fellows in the United States. Total receipts for the year, $5,530,383.71; relief, $2,176,269.41, which shows that the brethren paid in during the year about $10 apiece and drew out for relief about $4.

LITERATURE.

Poems of the Prairies (Annabel and other poems.) By Ellen P. Allerton. Pp. 153. Price 70 cents. John B. Alden, New York.

A bright and naturaly refined mind is revealed in this neat little volume. Mrs. Allerton resides in Hamlin, Kansas, and the tone of her poems is genuine and true to their title. While singing of love and human passion, it is uniformly in the plaintive, sad, reflected echo of the broad and lonely swells of the prairie land, green with verdure or bright with flowers or sparkling with dew in a morning sun, but always its voices have a somber monotone. "Annabel," the longest of the poems, is now published for the first time, many of the shorter ones have appeared from time to time in the periodical press. The work is well done, but the story is melancholy, bad and improbable, one especially not to be put in the hands of a newly wedded pair. The shorter poems, about one hundred in number, are the best. They breathe the fresh life of the prairies, and feel the breadth of its touch, and are tuned to its one key also. The work is justly securing for Mrs. Allerton a worthy place among our Ameriean poets.

Letters from a Mother to a Mother on the formation, growth and care of the teeth. By the wife of a Dentist, Mrs. M. W. J., Honorary member Southern Dental Association. Pp. 106; price 25 cents. Welch Dental Co., Philadelphia.

The million mothers who have suffered, some of them months of distracting pain, and finally been compelled to undergo the expensive and sometimes dangerous operation of clearing the mouth for a set of artificial teeth, should hail this volume of letters. The few pennies invested in it may save them onee, twice or thrice as many dollars. The instruction it contains concerning the formation of the teeth will be invaluable to every mother, and the simple and natural methods of securing themselves and their little ones from the racking pains of toothache and the terrors of decay are so reasonable and inexpensive that the principles herein presented must be approved by every one. Dr. T. B. Welch of the publishers formerly lived at Vineland, N. J., and is well and favorably known the country over.

Happy Moments, a rare collection of secular and sacred songs for the school room, concerts, etc. By S. W. Straub. Pp. 176; price, 50 cents. S. W. Straub, Chicago.

The character of the music adapted for public schools has been studied in the preparation of this new song book. There will be found in Happy Moments songs new and old that are calculated to add materially to the "happy moments" of the school room. The words are designed to foster the noble aims of life, and teach industry, perseverance, hope, kindness, respect, duty, obedience, patriotism, temperanee, and trust in God. In writing and selecting the tunes for Happy Moments the following points seem to have been kept in view: Beauty of melody from the children's standpoint; tunes that will express the sentiment, and tunes that will not go too high for the safety of children's voices. This book also contains an elementary department at once so simple, easy, progressive, and interesting that any day school teacher, who can read simple music, can teach the pupils to read music intelligently. The publisher offers to send one copy for examination with a view to adoption to any teacher on receipt of 30 cents.

—Modern Freemasonry makes a poor appearance in comparison with the glories, achievements, and stern administration of mediæval Freemasonry as we see it in the pages of Mr. George F. Fort, whose "Early History and Antiquities of Freemasonry" is a standard work, not limited in its value to the particular end to which it is devoted, but which throws light on much that was peculiar to the customs of mediæval times.—Independent.

President Seeley, of Amherst College, is writing a life of Napoleon.

Samuel J. Tilden has had 187 books read to him within the last two years.

The trial of editor Stead of the London Pall-Mall Gazette is begun quickly after the indictment of the grand jury. The "influential personages" who have been instrumental in bringing about the prosecution may find that they have opened the door to such a sewer flood of revolting facts, as will leave them covered with odium. The Methodists of England have superceded the Salvation Army in this movement which is warmly advocated by their organs and pulpits. Large collections, amounting to thousands of dollars, have been taken to prosecute it, and it is proposed to inaugurate a general system of boycotting business houses, managed by immoral men. The separation of such social lepers would be a wholesome measure in America also.

MY MASTER.

"I love my Master; I will not go out free. And he shall serve him forever." Ex. 21: 5, 6.

I love, I love my Master,
I will not go out free,
For he is my Redeemer,
He paid the price for me.

I would not leave his service,
It is so sweet and blest;
And in the weariest moments
He gives the truest rest.

I would not halve my service,
His only it must be.—
His only, who so loved me
And gave himself for me.

My Master shed his life-blood
My vassal life to win,
And save me from the bondage
Of tyrant self and sin.

He chose me for his service
And gave me power to choose
That blessed "perfect freedom"
Which I shall never lose.

For he hath met my longing
With word of golden tone,
That I shall serve forever
Himself, Himself alone.

"Shall serve him" hour by hour,
For he will show me how;
My Master is fulfilling
His promise even now!

"Shall serve Him," and "forever;"
O hope most sure, most fair!
The perfect love outpouring
In perfect service there!

Rejoicing and adoring,
Henceforth my song shall be:
I love, I love my Master:
I will not go out free!

FIVE FAITHFUL SAYINGS.

Repeatedly does the apostle Paul in his later epistles to Timothy and Titus, quote certain sayings, axioms, or proverbs, which he denominates "Faithful Sayings," and which seem to have passed into the current thought of the Christians of his time; possibly having been handed down from the earlier followers of the Saviour, and some of them, perhaps, having fallen from the lips of the Great Teacher himself. Paul quotes these sayings as worthy of all acceptation, as embodying truths which none could deny, and which all should receive and believe.

The following are the faithful sayings mentioned by Paul, which are well-worthy of being remembered by all serious minds. We quote them as given in the Revised Version, as follows:

1. Faithful is the saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners. 1 Tim 1: 15.
2. Faithful is the saying, If a man seeketh the office of a bishop, he desireth a good work. 1 Tim. 3: 1.
3. Faithful is the saying, and worthy of all acceptation, For to this end we labor and strive, because we have our hope set on the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, especially of them that believe. 1 Tim. 4: 9, 10.
4. Faithful is the saying, and concerning these things I will that thou affirm confidently, to the end that they which have believed God may be careful to maintain good works Titus 3: 8.
5. Faithful is the saying, For if we die with him, we shall also live with him: if we endure, we shall also reign with him: if we shall deny him, he also will deny us: if we are faithless, he abideth faithful, for he cannot deny himself. 2 Tim. 2: 11-13.—The Christian.

"LOOKING UNTO JESUS."

It is ever the Holy Spirit's work to turn our eyes away from self to Jesus; but Satan's work is just the opposite of this, for he is constantly trying to make us regard ourselves instead of Christ. He insinuates, "Your sins are too great for pardon; you have no faith; you do not repent enough; you will never be able to continue to the end; you have not the joy of his children; you have such a wavering hold of Jesus." All these are thoughts about self. The Spirit tells us that we are nothing, but that "Christ is all in all. Remember, therefore, it is not thy hold of Christ that saves thee, it is Christ; it is not thy joy in Christ that saves thee, it is Christ; it is not even faith in Christ, though that be the instrument—it is Christ's blood and merits; therefore look not so much to thy hand with which thou art grasping Christ, as to Christ; look not to thy hope, but to Jesus, the source of thy hope; look not to thy faith, but to Jesus, the author and finisher of thy faith. We shall never find happiness by looking at our prayers, our doings, or our feelings; it is what Jesus is, not what we are that gives rest to the soul. If we would at once overcome Satan and have peace with God, it must be by "looking unto Jesus." Keep thine eye simply on him; let his death, his suffering, his merits, his glories, his intercessions, be fresh upon thy mind; when thou wakest in the morning look to him; when thou liest down at night look to him. Oh! let not thy hopes and fears come between thee and Jesus; follow hard after Him, and he will never fail thee.

Whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises.—2 Peter 1: 4.

He that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out.—John 6: 37. Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely.—Rev. 22: 17. For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life.—John 3: 16. Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved.—Acts 2: 21. Behold I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in to him and will sup with him and he with me.—Rev. 3: 20. Come unto me all ye that labor and I will give you rest.—Matt. 9: 28. Who his own self bare our sins.—1 Peter 2: 24. He was wounded for our transgressions.—Isa. 53:5. Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved.—Acts 16: 31. Neither is there salvation in any other.—Acts 14: 12.

"Leave God to order all thy ways,
And trust in him whate'er betide;
Thou'lt find him in the evil days
A very present help and Guide,
Who trusts in God's unchanging love,
Builds on a rock that naught can move."

"A QUEER-SHAPED LUMP."

A young mother, while dressing a very young child, a short time ago, said rather impatiently:

"You are such a queer-shaped little lump of a thing it is impossible to make anything fit you."

The lips of the child quivered, and looking up with tears in its eyes, it said, in a deprecatory tone, "God made me."

The mother was rebuked, and the "little lump" was kissed a dozen times.

How many women there are who seem to forget that God made the human form, and that he had correct ideas of its true porportions. They are not at all willing to grow after the pattern which the Lord ordained. They cramp their feet, and compress their waists, they distort their bodies, ruin their health, and cut short their lives.

The apostle taught us that our bodies are temples of the Holy Ghost; and who is there that has the presumption to cramp and distort and injure forms which God has made to be temples for the indwelling of his Spirit? When once the sacredness of the human body is understood, a Christian woman will no more distort her form and ruin her health by yielding to the dictates of pride and fashion, than she would curse, swear, or get drunk.

How many poor women are to-day mouldering in the grave, who might have been in the enjoyment of health and streugth and happiness, had they thoroughly realized the truth stated by this little child, "God made me," and lived in accordauce with the law and will of Him who formed man in his own image. Said the Psalmist:

"I will give thanks unto thee, for I am fearfully and wonderfully made;
Wonderful are thy works; and that my soul knoweth right well.
My frame was not hidden from thee, when I was made in secret,
And curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth.
Thine eyes did see mine unperfect substance,
And in thy book were all my members written,
Which day by day were fashioned,
When as yet there were none of them." Psalm 89: 14-16.

Common People.

PEACE.

God has promised to keep them in perfect peace whose minds are stayed on him. Amid all the storms and conflicts of life, a deep and sweet calm pervades their breasts, and in the composure of their souls they can smile at the commotion and strife around them. They are at peace with God, being reconciled through the death of his Son; they are at peace with themselves, having the answer of a good conscience, and every thought being brought into subjection to the law of Christ; and they are at peace with all men through the spirit of Christian charity which they possess. No external opposition or trials can rob them of this sweet peace of mind, and no perseeutions or temptations can divert them from their course, or turn them aside from the path of duty.

Says the Psalmist: "Great peace have they that love thy law, and nothing shall offend them." "The peace of God which passeth all understanding," says the apostle, "shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus." This was the legacy which Christ left to his disciples, "In the world ye shall have tribulation, but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world." "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you; not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid." This is the portion of God's people—a portion of which the world can never rob them—a portion that shall never be taken from them.—Methodist Recorder.

HOW SHALL I DRESS TO-DAY.

"How shall I dress to-day,
To please my Lord?
For surely he does care
What kind of dress I wear,
And watches me prepare,
With helping word.

For all the Christian's dress
A mirror is.
Through it the world can see
What my soul's dress will be,
Pride or humility,
My robe or His.

What shall I eat and drink,
To please my Lord?
I must not take of all
My appetite shall call,
Earth's sweets that quickly pall
Can I afford?

A Christian's meat and drink
A mirror is.
The hungry world can tell,
If God supplies me well,
And makes my garners swell
With best of his. —Sel.

THE LITTLE SLAVE-MAKERS.

We told, in a recent number, of our young friend Karl's desire to see a battle between the red and black ants. Aunt Kate yielded to his wish, and on a warm, sunshiny morning went to the spot where he had found the red ant's hill. It differed but slightly in appearance from that of the black ants, who lived, as she found, about ten feet from the reds. How to make warfare between these neighbors was a matter of serious consideration, but that Karl might learn the habits of these earnest toilers, she was willing to make an effort to arouse their warlike feeling.

First, Karl crumbled sugar at the opening of the red ant's nest, which had a hole on the side, about which were tiny bits of straw and fine points that screened the hole from view.

As if to see from whose hand this manna had fallen, two large red ants ventured forth. They tasted the sugar and found that it was good. They went back to the hill, spread the news, and hordes of red ants came out of the hole, and busied themselves carrying home this spoil unexpected.

How to bring the black ants into the camp of the reds was the questiou, but Karl accidentally decided it. He made a line of sugar from one nest to the other, and thereby enticed the blacks to come forth to share the food. The reds attacked the skirmishers who came first from the black lines to spy out the land. Guerilla warfare ensued, each red fighting with a black, till, as was invariably the result, the red ants were in the end victorious. If a red ant conquered quickly he left his victim and went to the help of a fellow soldier who seemed to have more than a match in his antagonist. The battle raged all day and all night, and thousands of ants took part in it. Aunt Kate took home with her at sunset a number of the fighters, both black and red, and, observing them under the glass, she fouud that these soldiers did uot weary of the contest until every black ant had been destroyed.

In the morning Karl was up bright and early to visit the battle ground. The fight still continued, and, when Aunt Kate went to the field later in the day, the scene of carnage was distressing. The black warriors had been overcome, and the red soldiers were in possession of the black ants' fortress. Guards of red soldiers stood before the red ant-hill and also before the late home of the blacks. Lines of red ants were passing in and out of the hill of the blacks, carrying in their mouths little black balls. Aunt Kate did not know what these were, so she put them under the magnifying glass and soon discovered that the black ants held in their mouths pupæ or unhatched ants of their own kind. To protect these from the touch of the intruders, the nurses doubled themselves up about them, just as little kittens roll themselves up in a soft ball when any one tries to sieze hold of them. Each red invader carried home a stranger ant, larvæ or pupæ, or small grey and little black ants, and all work seemed to cease until this capture of children to be brought up as slaves was ended. Then the organization of the captured forces ensued. Karl put leaves, wet with sugared water, near the red ants' nest, and also honey to tempt them. The black and red ants, with the young in charge, came out of the hill and sucked the sweets and fed their babies, and no soldier on duty attempted to prevent the passage of these nurses. These care-taking servants bring their charges out when the sun is warm and give them its benefits, and hastily carry them back to the nest if the weather is threatening. The large black ants were set to work, enlarging the entrances to the hill and repairing the outside which had been marred in the fray. Red soldiers superintended the work of these black captives, and red ants worked by the side of the newly made slaves. Aunt Kate saw blacks transferred by the ants in command, from one point to the other, as increased force might seem necessary, and no attempt to resist authority was made by these prisoners. The soldier in command simply touched the black slave with his antennæ, and at once he followed his captor wherever he led the way. The reds carried their wounded into the home, but left the most of their dead on the battle ground. And attempts were observed on the part of the honey-pouched ants to nourish the disabled soldiers, and, while the wounded were tenderly carried into the hill, the dead soldiers were afterward brought out by their comrades. Doubtless these were the soldiers who had died from their wounds.

Aunt Kate's sympathy was, of course, with the black ants, who had been so completely overthrown by the reds, and she found that, after a day or two, many stragglers returned to the old home to find it deserted and their children in possession of their foes. But even then these sufferers patiently went to work again to put in order their sacked dwelling place; and Karl said he hoped that in the next fight they would whip their enemies, and release all their captive relations and friends.—The American Reformer.

NEAREST WAY TO HEAVEN.

When Mr. Whitefield was preaching in New England, a lady became the subject of divine grace, and her spirit was particularly drawn out in prayer for others. She could persuade no one to pray with her but her little daughter, about ten years of age. After a time it pleased God to touch the heart of the little child and give her the hope of salvation. In a transport of joy she then exclaimed: Oh, mother, if all the world knew this! I wish I could tell everybody. Pray, mother, let me run to some of the neighbors and tell them that they may be happy and love the Saviour." "Ah, my child," said the mother, "that would be useless, for I suppose that were you to tell your experience, there is not one in many miles who would not laugh at you and say it was all a delusion." "Oh, mother," replied the little girl, "I must go over to the shoemaker's and tell him; he will believe me." She ran over and found him at work in the shop. She began telling him he must die, that he was a sinner, and she was a sinner, but that her blessed Saviour had heard her mother's prayer and forgiven all her sins, and that now she was so happy she did not know how to tell it. The shoemaker was struck with surprise, and his tears flowed like rain. He threw aside his work; and by prayer and supplication sought mercy and life. The neighborhood was awakened, and within a few months, more than fifty persons were brought to the knowledge of Jesus and rejoiced in his power and grace.—New York Observer.

The child who has learned to see bright, glad things in life will more easily catch the gleam of heavenly radiance which shall shine more and more brightly.

TEMPERANCE.

TEMPERANCE WORK.

It was our pleasant privilege to attend the annual meeting of the New Hampshire Woman's Christian Temperance Union as corresponding messenger from the N. H. Christian Association. Our reception was very cordial, and a lady messenger was appointed to the N. H. C. A. An account of the convention will be found in another column. It was our misfortune some years ago to trample under foot the plain dictate of reason and teaching of the Bible (Lev. 5: 4) by joining a Good Templar's Lodge, promising to conceal it secrets and obey its laws, both of which were concealed. We repeated the same sins on entering the Grand Lodge. We have confessed and forsaken these sins and obtained forgiveness.

We mention these things at this time to contrast the child's play, idle ritualistic babble, mimicry and nonsense of a Grand Lodge with the elevating, instructive, soul-inspiring, noble work of the annual meeting of the temperance Christian women of New Hampshire. In the former, with tyled doors, we were taught how a temperance man should grip the hand of a "brother," crook his finger, what angle to make with his arm, how to wear his lodge clothes and such other mighty lore. In the latter, with open doors and crowded audiences, we were taught the highest lessons of Christian philanthropy, the most approved methods of reform work. The high motives of love to God and love to man were presented with thrilling eloquence. We were encouraged by having set before us the promises of the ever-present and all-powerful Christ, and the co-operating influence of the waiting Spirit. Complete consecration to God would fit us for our work, and never failing grace would help us to success. Plans were devised to guard the innocent youth, to hallow the Sabbath, rescue fallen women and besotted men, and redeem the race under the leadership of the all-conquering Christ. How sharp the contrast between the lodge work of darkness and the Lord's work of light!

WHAT SENSIBLE WOMEN LIKE.

Sensible women like sober men, and they have good cause to like them. Wives like sober husbands, because a sober man can be reasoned with. A sober man is more companionable than an intemperate man. Sober men have self-respect, and self-respect is woman's great hold upon men. Sobriety means a comfortable home, a house of your own, good clothes for parents and children, evenings spent at home instead of in the bar-room, good health and the enjoyment of life, and an elevated view of human responsibility.

A sober man is an honor to his wife and children; and people who despise a tippler, respect a sober man. A sober man becomes a pattern to the young, an ornament to society, a man in whom communities take pride and wish there were more like him. A sober man is appreciated by his friends and family, and even respected by his enemies, and his reputation and good qualities grow with his years. On the other hand, the intemperate man shows in his indulgences a fatal, disgraceful weakness of character; and as the habit of intemperance grows upon him, he becomes wretched, degraded, debased, and finally goes down to ruin, dragging his whole family after him.—Sel.

DON'T STIMULATE THE YOUNG.

If you give to a healthy man of twenty, who has never tasted it, either a cup of tea or coffee, it will keep him awake all night. If you give to one who has never drank fermented or distilled liquors, a glass of beer, wine, or weak whisky and water, it will make him more or less dizzy, and perhaps give him a headache. If you persuade one who has never smoked to try a cigar, it will probably nauseate him, and for a time make him severely sick.

Now, what is the conclusion from these facts? Simply that tea, coffee, fermented and distilled liquors and tobacco are in their nature medicinal; are, in brief, drugs, and that, at least while the body is growing, while it still has a superabundance of vital force, it does not need either the preservative properties of tea or coffee, or the digestive and tonic ones of wine, beer or brandy, or the soothing power of tobacco, to keep it in health and well-being; but that, on the contrary, when the youthful system is in its natural state and either is offered it, disturbance, more or less pronounced, is the result.

What terrible responsibility, then, do mothers and fathers incur who from babyhood allow their little children to drink tea and coffee—nay, before the little things think of asking for it, tempt them to sip it out of their own teaspoon! Women, from high to low, are always anxious to be in fashion. They will dress their children as nearly as possible like the little aristocrats of Beacon street and Fifth Avenue, and why will they not feed them also as these little "swells" are fed? A Beacon street mother would be horrified at the thought of giving young children either tea or coffee. Plenty of the richest milk, with oat meal, or mush, or hominy, simple puddings, juicy meat, and cold bread and butter, form the principal diet of these rich children who look so rosy and so handsome. Tea they never get.—Boston Post.

THE COST OF INTOXICANTS.

It would not be fair to assume, as some of the advocates of temperance do, that the whole of this vast sum is a loss to the country. A large part of it is paid out to labor in the shape of wages and to the government of the country, as well as to those of city and township, as taxes which would have to be otherwise imposed if not paid by the depraved appetites of the people and the men who eater thereto. And there is also some plausibility in the plea that in the absence of such indulgence, either for want of the appetite or the means of gratifying it, the prices of wages would be reduced, owing to the greater competition for work and the smaller number of desires to be gratified by the average worker. But it is at least equally undeniable that a large part of the expense of government, including the machinery of our civil courts as well as the criminal, would have no reason to exist were it not for the use of intoxicants. It is drinking that makes men quarrelsome; and it is probably responsible for more than half the lawsuits properly so-called, as well as 90 per cent of the criminal trials in our courts. In the absence of intoxication, partial or complete, society would need few policemen or sheriff's officers, few judges and lawyers to argue and decide cases at law, few men qualified by utter ignorance to act as jurymen, scarcely half as many doctors of medicine, hardly any bridewells or penitentiaries, fewer insane asylums, and not a quarter as much legislation as now, while the character of the latter would be vastly improved by sobriety on the part of the average legislator. There might be a little more trouble than now in finding employment, owing to the closing up of so many channels of effort; but people would not need to work so long or so hard as they do at present while the increased leisure of the worker would not be a curse to society by fostering intoxication. Who can say that we should not at one step compass the greater part of the distance from this to the millennium by abolishing the use of whisky, beer, and tobacco?—Chicago Tribune.

PROHIBITION FROM A BUSINESS STANDPOINT.

Let any man who scoffs at prohibition and its material good, go about Des Moines to-day—even this early—and locate the former sites of saloons, sites then occupied by old shanties and rented by saloon-keepers who employed no clerks and no help, and and who robbed laboring men and their families daily of their earnings and then compare the same properties, their value to the city and to society with the large brick blocks erected on them in the last two seasons or since the prohibitory law went into effect, and inspect the business now being carried on on the same sites, the character of the business, the amount of capital invested to carry it on, adding so largely to the taxable wealth of the city, and the value of better paid employment, and then let him answer the question himself, which is best for the city, these brick blocks, and the new stores, and the large employment given by the new stores, or the old rotten shanties and the saloons in them that used to be?

Who in Des Moines would swap back to-day and give the fine new blocks on Walnut street alone, and the fine business now occupying them, mostly new ones to the city, to have back the license law and the shanties and saloons that went with them?

Saying nothing of the vast moral good prohibition has accomplished in Des Moines, of the men it has made sober, of the money it has saved to the families of drinking men, of the good the money thus saved has done to children by way of educating them and making them more comfortable, of the number of men it has restored to ways of industry and usefulness, or the men it has saved from crime, of the boys it has prevented from learning to drink, the material good it has already wrought before it has hardly started, is enough to commend it to the approval of all right-thinking people.—Iowa State Register.

The Churches.

—The first of a new series of Sunday afternoon temperance lectures was delivered, October 4, in Music Hall, Boston, by the Rev. Joseph Cook.

—The First church of Hartford, Conn., has published a full catalogue of its members from its organization in 1635, comprising about 10,000 names and making a volume of 272 pages.

—The American Inter-Seminary Missionary Alliance, whose membership represents fifty seminaries, held its sixth annual meeting at the Baptist Seminary, Rochester, October 22 to 25.

—All the Wesleyan Methodist ministers in London vacated their pulpits on a recent Sunday, in order that the local preachers might have an opportunity to address the congregations, and the number of laymen who discoursed was estimated at not less than 275.

—The annual meeting of the American Missionary Association is being held at Madison, Wis., this week. Dr. Reuen Thomas, of Boston, preaches the opening sermon. Mr. Geo. W. Cable of New Orleans, Gen. J. L. Chamberlin of Maine, and other attractive speakers are to make addresses. Next Sabbath, in Chicago, the secretaries of the A. M. A. and some of the other speakers will occupy several of the city pulpits and will give the churches a sort of second edition of the annual meeting.

—The Chicago Congregational ministers discussing Sunday Services, a paper by Rev. E. D. Eaton, on the Drift and Advance in the Sunday Services, said that the drift was, first, toward regarding the services as entertainment; second, away from the working classes; third, away from the evening service. Under the indications and possibilities of advance, he would make, first, the worship of God prominent; second, fill the services with reality; third, make the services full of variety; fourth, seek to come to a personal consecration to Christ.

—It was fifty years ago last Sunday since the first missionary landed on the Fiji Islands.

—Incendiaries burned the East Avenue Presbyterian church at Schenectady, N. Y., Monday night. The loss is $20,000, and insurance $14,000.

—The eleventh annual convention of the Women's Board of Missions of the Christian church of the United States, was opened last Tuesday in Cleveland, O. Between 500 and 600 delegates were present, besides many visitors. Delegates were present from twenty-one States. The addition of 153 auxiliary branches during the past year was reported. The receipts for the year were $16,620.09.

—The North Ohio U. B. Conference is one of the firmest against the insidious inroads of the lodge. At its late meeting Rev. W. Dillon, editor of the Conservator of Dayton, was elected bishop pro tem, and the conference resolved in disapproval of the action of the late General Conference at Fostoria, Ohio, in revising the church constitution, and also "That we will interpret the new law on secret societies in harmony with the constitution, to exclude all secret societies." Prof. L. Davis received the kindest Christian greetings and Bishop Weaver's ideas on the church rule against secret societies was repudiated.

—Berlin has over one million adherents of the evangelical faith and yet has but thirty-eight churches and thirteen chapels, with a combined seating capacity of less than 50,000. The St. Thomas congregation embraces 130,000 souls, but has only 1,700 seats; the Holy Cross congregation numbers 70,000, but has seatings only for 500; St. Simon congregation, with its 50,000 members, has seats for only 500; and the others in proportion. Such a state of affairs tells its own story, and it is not surprising that, under such circumstances, the well-organized City Mission Society cannot do justice to the task before it.

—The Moravians report for their twelve missions, 28,820 communicants. These missions have 115 stations and 282 missionary agents. The total expenditure last year was $96,800.

—The number of communicants in connection with the various evangelical missions in China is now reported at 26,287, of whom 10,541 are credited to American societies, 10,044 to British, and 1,700 to Continental. The Presbyterian Board stands at the head of the list, with 3,777; the English Presbyterian Board comes next, with 3,105; and the London Society is third, with 2,924. The Presbyterian Board has the greatest number of native helpers—213. The China Inland has the largest force of missionaries—113. There are in all 514 missionaries, including males and females, and 1,450 native helpers.

—There is a lady, a Presbyterian missionary on the West Coast of Africa, the only white Christian for some hundreds of miles around, and no means of travel but by a skiff up and down the river. She has the training of young men and women, not only in their education and Christian life, but in their every-day pursuits, and she is as happy as a mortal can be in this world, glad to be able to go where no one else with less of Christ wants to go. The Comforter is her constant companion.—The Evangelist.

—The Caroline Islands, which have been brought into prominence of late through the seizure of some of them by Germany and the consequent protest of Spain, are the field of important missionary operations. Secretary Judson Smith, of the A. B. C. F. M., writes to the New York Herald that American missionaries have been at work there for over thirty years past, that about fifty churches have been organized, with an aggregate of four thousand communicants, schools have been established, books printed in the native dialects, and civilized customs, dress, etc., introduced. "No European nation," says the doctor, "has had anything to do with these islands since American missionaries have labored there, and all that makes them valuable as possessions and profitable as centers of trade is due to what these American missionaries have done and are now doing."

FAITH TRAINING COLLEGE.

This college cannot rival Harvard and Yale in wealth of cash endowments or number of students, but its peculiarities so accord with the Gospel as to commend it to notice. It is located in Boston. Charles Cullis, M. D., is president and professor of Christian work; Rev. A. B. Earle, D. D., professor of revival work; Rev. Wm. McDonald, professor of Christian life; Rev. W. H. Daniels, professor of the doctrine of the Holy Spirit; C. W. Emerson, M. D., professor of oratory; D. G. Woodvine, M. D., professor of natural theology; Rev. L. D. Bates, D. D., professor of systematic theology; Rev. E. D. Mallory, professor of Bible study and exegesis; H. L. Hastings, professor of Christian evidences.

We venture to predict that the young men who graduate from this Bible school will not countenance church fairs, dancing, card playing, and other sins and follies now so common among church people. Neither will their throats prove too weak to allow them to preach more than one sermon a week. Neither will they refuse to preach unless promised a stated salary. Neither will they run in debt and sneak off to the lasting disgrace of the religion they profess. Neither will they enter the tyled doors of a secret lodge "to increase their influence" by joining profane men in the heathen worship of a Christless religion. In a word, we believe this college will send out for the work of the ministry, Christian men. No tuition is charged, and the only text-book is the Bible. We commend this school to the favorable notice of all young men having the ministry in view. For particulars, address Dr. Charles Cullis, No. 2 Beacon Hill Place, Boston, Mass.—Christian Witness.

AN APPEAL TO DISCIPLES EVERYWHERE.

Issued by the Northfield, Mass., Convention.

To Fellow-believers of every name, scattered throughout the world, Greeting:

Assembled in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, with one accord, in one place, we have continued for ten days in prayer and supplication, communing with one another about the common salvation, the blessed hope, and the duty of witnessing to a lost world.

It was near to our place of meeting that, in 1747, at Northampton, Jonathan Edwards sent forth his trumpet-peal, calling upon disciples everywhere to unite in prayer for an effusion of the Spirit upon the whole inhabitable globe. That summons to prayer marks a new era and epoch in the history of the church of God. Praying bands began to gather in this and other lands; mighty revivals of religion followed; immorality and infidelity were wonderfully checked; and, after more than fifteen hundred years of apaty and lethargy, the spirit of missions was reawakened. In 1784, the monthly concert was begun, and in 1792, the first missionary society formed in England; in 1793, William Carey, the pioneer missionary, sailed for India. Since then, one hundred missionary boards have been organized, and probably not less than one hundred thousand missionaries, including women, have gone forth into the harvest-field. The Pillar has moved before these humble laborers, and the two-leaved gates have opened before them, until the whole world is now accessible. The ports and portals of pagan, Moslem, and even papal lands are now unsealed, and the last of the hermit nations welcomes the missionary. Results of missionary labor in the Hawaiian and Fiji Islands, in Madagascar, in Japan, probably have no parallel even in apostolic days; while even Pentecost is surpassed by the ingathering of ten thousand converts in one mission station in India within sixty days, in the year 1878. The missionary bands had scarce compassed the walls and sounded the Gospel trumpet, when those walls fell, and we had but to march straight on and take possession of Satan's strongholds.

God has thus, in answer to prayer, opened the door of access to the nations. Out of the Pillar there comes once more a voice: "Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward." And yet the church of God is slow to move in response to the providence of God. Nearly a thousand millions of the human race are yet without the Gospel; vast districts are wholly unoccupied. So few are the laborers, that, if equally dividing responsibility, each must care for at least one hundred thousand souls. And yet there is abundance of both men and means in the church to give the Gospel to every living soul before this century closes. If but ten millions, out of four hundred millions of nominal Christians, would undertake such systematic labor as that each one of that number should, in the course of fifteen years, reach one hundred other souls with the Gospel message, the whole present population of the globe would have heard the good tidings by the year 1900!

Our Lord's own words are: "Go ye, therefore, and disciple all nations;" and "This Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come." Peter exhorts us both to "look for and hasten the coming of the day of God;" and what if our inactivity delays his coming? Christ is waiting "to see of the travail of his soul;" and we are impressed that two things are just now of great importance; first, the immediate occupation and evangelization of every destitute district of the earth's population; and, secondly, a new effusion of the Spirit in answer to united prayer.

If at some great centre like London or New York, a great council of evangelical believers could meet, to consider the wonder-working of God's providence and grace in mission fields, and how fields now unoccupied may be insured from further neglect, and to arrange and adjust the work so as to prevent needless waste and friction among workmen, it might greatly further the glorious object of a world's evangelization; and we earnestly commend the suggestion to the prayerful consideration of the various bodies of Christion believers, and the various missionary organizations. What a spectacle it would present both to angels and men, could believers of every name, forgetting all things in which they differ, meet, by chosen representatives, to enter systematically and harmoniously upon the work of sending forth laborers into every part of the world-field!

But, above all else, our immediate and imperative need is a new spirit of earnest and prevailing prayer. The first Pentecost crowned ten days of united, continued supplication. Every subsequent advance may be directly traced to believing prayer, and upon this must depend a new Pentecost. We, therefore, earnestly appeal to all fellow-disciples to join us and each other in importunate, daily supplication for a new and mighty effusion of the Holy Spirit upon all ministers, missionaries, evangelists, pastors, teachers, and Christian workers, and upon the whole earth; that God would impart to all Christ's witnesses the tongues of fire, and melt hard hearts before the burning message. It is not by might nor by power, but by the Spirit of the Lord, that all true success must be secured. Let us call upon God till he answereth by fire! What we are to do for the salvation of the lost we must do quickly; for the generation is passing away, and we with it. Obedient to our marching orders, let us "go into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature," while from our very hearts we pray, "Thy kingdom come."

Grace, mercy, and peace be with you all.

This Washboard is made of one solid sheet of heavy corrugated zinc, which produces a double-faced board of the best quality and durability. The fluting is very deep, holding more water, and consequently doing better washing than any washboard in the market. The frame is made of hard wood and held together with an iron bolt running through a tube formed on the lower edge of the zinc, thus binding the whole together in the most substantial manner, and producing a wash board which for economy, excellence and durability, is unquestionably the best in the world. We find so many dealers that object to our board on account of its DURABILITY, saying, "It will last too long We can never sell a customer but one." We take this means to advise customers to INSIST upon having the NORTH STAR WASHBOARD.

NEEDLE WORK

Needle-Work: A Manual of Stitches and Studies in Embroidery and Drawn Work. Edited by Jenny June.
This manual is an attempt to systematize and arrange in an order convenient for workers, the modern methods in Embroidery and Drawn Work. The author has felt the desire and the responsibility involved in aiding women to a true and practical guide to the beautiful art of needle-work. When the Angel of Mercy begged that woman might not be created because she would be abused by man, as the stronger, the Lord listened, but felt that he could not give up the whole scheme of creation, so he gave the loving Angel permission to bestow upon her any compensating gift she chose, and the Angel pityingly endowed her with tears and the love of needle-work. This book is printed on fine paper, has a handsome cover, and contains

FARM NOTES.

AMERICAN ROADS.

Let any one drive over most American roads in the spring with open eyes and wits, and see what unchecked destruction is at work—streams are running in the tracks that the removal of sod would turn into the drains; holes are lying full of water until May or June, being worked into lava beds by the sun; stones coming up by frost and lying to combat every passing wheel until they are actually worn out, as are the wagons that bump over them. And all this in the midst of men with libraries in their houses, modern tools in their barns, keen brains in their heads, and horses of value eating their heads off, waiting for the roads to dry up so that they can dance out after a long rest and lame themselves on the first round stone! It was a wise discovery of the late John Wilkinson, in his management of one of the first railways in the State, that $1 on the track was worth $2 in the shop, and it will be the era of better days in roads when it is understood that $1 25 in a day's work, at the proper time, on the road, will save many times that sum in wear and damage that only high-priced mechanics can repair.

But the road makers are not alone at fault. Our ordinary wagons were made to destroy roads, with round narrow tires and a uniform track, the latter the best possible arrangement for putting all travel in line and making ruts. If roads were railroad tracks, an even width of track would of course be the thing, but for roads it is just as far from a saving as any possible invention. Buying once a "trap" in England, as light "rigs" are called, the writer asked if it had the ordinary width of track. The honest maker scratched his puzzle head and confessed he did not know any such thing; when it was made plain to him, he said there was no rule of the kind, and just here is the secret of the small wear and tear of foreign roads—the wheel tread is all over the road.

Unless the roads are very favorably situated with regard to good gravel, all that are subject to a large amount of travel must in time be made of broken stone. This has been the result in all older countries, and time and a growing demand for good roads will force the practice upon us, and it need not be a costly process, if done gradually and with system. It is not worth while in ordinary work of the kind to dig out the roadway, when one exists. If it is hard it is well let alone; if soft, coarse stones can be pushed down from above, in the spring, until it holds firm, and any soft material that is crowded up can be removed when wet. Country Gentleman.

THE LAW OF THE ROAD.

TURN TO THE RIGHT.—The most important law of the road is, that when two persons in vehicles coming from opposite directions are about to meet, each shall reasonably bear to the right of the middle or travelled portion of the road, so that they can pass each other without interference. A traveller is not required to keep on the right side of the road all the time; he can drive where he pleases or where the going is best, so long as he turns to the right when he meets another vehicle. If the middle and usually travelled portion of the road is very muddy, and for this or any other reason persons are travelling along the side of the road, then the one who is on the left side of the road is in duty bound to turn out. In Massachusetts it was held that when the part of the road which is wrought for travelling is hidden by snow, and a path is beaten and travelled on the side of the wrought path, persons meeting on such side path are each required to drive their vehicles to the right of the middle of it. It should, however, be remembered that this law of the road is not an absolute and inflexible one. Circumstances may arise which would justify a deviation from it, and when they do arise, a traveller cannot stick blindly to the law and then claim damages if he is injured. In the crowded streets of a metropolis drivers are required to exercise very great care, and when this high degree of care dictates a departure from this law of the road, then it is not only justifiable, but a failure to observe it might cut off one's right to recover damages if he is injured. This turning to the right is just the opposite of that in England, which requires all drivers to turn to the left. The rule of turning in England is based on long-honored custom: our rule is establisred by statute in the several States of the Union.

FOOT PASSENGERS.—All persons have the same right to walk in the highway that they have to drive there, and they have the same right to walk in the middle of the street that they have to walk on the foot paths at the side. When one is walking in the wagon track, he must observe greater care to avoid collision with vehicles, but the fact of his being there is not of itself negligence. It is his duty to turn out for teams, especially if heavily laden, but teamsters have no right to run over him simply because he happens to be in the way. They would be liable for the injury if they did. Foot passengers have the undoubted right to cross the street at any time and place, and persons driving along it must use due care not to run into them, and must hold up to let them get by. The foot passenger must also exercise due care to avoid injury, for if he does not, he can recover no damage if injured. If he sees a team coming at a rapid rate he is not justified in attempting to cross ahead of it, or should he attempt crossing a crowded thoroughfare without first looking carefully both ways.—H. A. Haigh, in American Agriculturist.

The accuracy of this exposition legally attested by J. O. Doesburg, Past Master Unity □ No. 191, Holland, Mich, and others. This is the latest, most accurate and complete exposition of Blue Lodge and Chapter Masonry. Over one hundred illustrations—several of them full page—give a pictorial representation of the lodge-room, chapter and principal ceremonies of the degrees, with the dress of candidates, signs, grips, etc. Complete work of 640 pages, in cloth, $1 00 per dozen, $9.00. All the persons in the mine were dashed to the ground by the force of the shock, four being killed and twelve wounded. Many of the injured, who are shockingly burned and also inhaled the flames, cannot recover.

The Quaker philanthropist of Philadelphia, Josiah W. Leeds, whose phamphlets against the theater and vicious literature have had a national circulation, has at length taken his case to the courts, and has come off in triumph. He procured the arrest of a theatrical manager for an obscene show-bill. The jury returned a verdict of guilty, and Judge Gilmore, accepting the statement of the manager that he would in the future be more careful, said it was time the business was stopped. The whole object was to get people into the place to see nude women. He wished it to be distinctly understood by everybody that the exposing of such show-bills and other pictures of such an objectionable sort must cease. The sentence in the present case would not be a measure of what would be likely to follow a repetition of the misdemeanor. He announced a fine of $100. Mr. Leeds deserves the thanks of the nation for his intrepidity in this matter, and now that he has opened the way, let the good work go on until the streets of our cities shall be cleared of these vicious and obscene invitations to schools of immorality. The evil is widespread and deep, and even ordinary concert companies seem to think it neccessary to use such appeals to draw the prurient crowd.

The Repbulican press carefully report the mortification of the Democrats with the President because of his independence of party amenities. Hon. Frederick Douglass, who has retained from the last administration the office of Register of Deeds in Washington, is looked after by some of the party men who want his place. Mr. Cleveland replied to their overtures in a very un-Democratic manner, by saying that if they would suggest the name of a good colored man he would appoint him! The deputation retired, confused and indignant. The President has also snubbed Mr. Voorhees, Senator from Indiana. The latter called to urge an appointment for United States Marshal, and was met by the cool remark, that it was to be hoped that the candidate was a better man than the others recommended by the Senator.

The revised returns of the Ohio election are reported: Foraker, Republican candidate for governor, 359,538; Hoadly, Democratic, 341,380; Leonard, Prohibition, 28,054; Northrup, Greenbacker, 2,760. Two years ago the vote of Foraker and Hoadly, both candidates as now, were just about transposed, and Ferdinard Schumacher, of Akron, received but 8,362 on the Prohibition ticket. These figures will do to remember. They prove at least that as many Democrats have joined the Prohibition ranks as Republicans. It must also be noted that Hamilton, the banner Prohibition county with 1,336 votes, is the county whose convention first raised the blue banner in favor of "OPEN METHODS" in temperance reform. What shall we have from the eleven States which hold elections this week?

President Cleveland has been forced to summary measures with the office-seeking horde at Washington and last Thursday issued a proclamation shutting them out from his presence when they come on that business. For eight months, he says a large portion of his time has been given to them, and he now concludes that the public welfare imperatively demands a change, in which all good citizens will acquiesce. Yes, and applaud the firmness and independence of the President who can set his foot upon this shameful business which has long enough disgraced the nation. It is an abuse never contemplated by the framers of the Constitution, and now that Mr. Cleveland has opened the way, let some patriot in Congress devise a plan which shall root out the evil.

Last week another act in a singular drama was closed in New York in the sentence of young Ward and his removal to Sing Sing penitentiary for ten years. There he will join Fish, the late president of the Marine bank, who is serving a like sentence, and who was brought into court to testify with a spiteful glee against his partner in crime. The country will never forgive Ward while they remember Grant. How much the latter's failing health was due to the swindling of Ward may never be explained; but none will say the judge was too severe when in pronouncing the sentence he said: "You seem to experience no remorse whatever over the ruin and sorrow which you have brought to hundreds of people in this country. You have done more to unsettle public confidence in public institutions than any other man in this generation. And yet through this entire trial you have shown yourself to be wholly unrepentant for the sins you have committed." But away from Wall street for ten years may make another man of this remorseless young villain.

The St. Louis street-car strikers and their Knight of Labor lodge is signalizing its defeat by repeated attempts to dynamite the cars, jeopardizing the lives of hundreds of passengers. This characteristic lodge warfare is justly denounced on all sides, and will not, of course, continue under such general approbrium; but it serves to inform the public mind of the nature of the tiger they are using for a plaything. "Jesse James," says the St. Louis Republican, "never put dynamite under street-cars to kill women and children in wholesale and indiscriminate murder. Yet Missouri set a price upon his head and hunted him to death in self-defense. Will less be done when acts are committed more dangerous and formidable than all the train robberies ever committed?"

The unpopularity of the British royal family, after the long and unexampled regard for Queen Victoria, has been noticed in these columns. There are some reasons which are valid, whether they are the correct ones or not. Mr. Wookey, secretary of the Gospel Purity Association, addressed, a while since, a crowded audience in the Corn Exchange, Luton, England, and referred to the trial of an infamous procuress, an old woman of 60, named Jeffries, who was indicted for keeping a number of human slaughter-houses, where the victims were young woman and girls, whose virtue was offered up to the lust of young aristocrats. Among the names of these male debauchees, which the prosecuting committee had obtained, were these: Lord Fyfe, Lord Douglas Gordon, Lord Lennox, Lord Aylesford, Sir William Eaton, Hon. Tyrwhit Wilson, Consul Hewett, the King of the Belgians and the Prince of Wales! Remembering that the movement to which the Pall Mall Gazette disclosures have given so great an impetus, has taken strong hold of the popular mind and feeling, this association of the name of their prospective king must arouse every latent feeling of indignation and abhorrence.

But this reason applies to but one member of the reigning family. Another more general one may be mentioned—a just reason for public reprobation. All the sons of the Queen are, we believe, enrolled in the Masonic lodge. The Prince of Wales, the great dancer and rake, has for repeated terms been elected Grand Master of English Masonry. This fact proves the order to be in complicity with his crimes, and justly suspected by the people as fostering the great curse of social impurity. The princes of the blood in becoming the patrons of Freemasonry have also erected a wall of secret oaths between themselves and the British masses, who for obvious reasons are unable to enter the order, even if disposed. It would be a satisfaction to know that the unpopularity of these young men was occasioned only by their unnatural and wicked lodge relation. It would prove a hopeful tendency in British society, and is an evil which they could readily put away from between them and the people.

GLIMPSES OF SOUTH AFRICA.

ESTCOURT, Natal, Sept. 7, 1885.

EDITORS CYNOSURE:—As some of your readers are aware, myself and wife landed here last June for mission work. We have found Natal to be more heathenish than we expected, and the natives very desirous of being taught. We were surprised at the amount of "caste" exhibited here among the whites. The American negro or the Indian would resent such treatment at once, but these Zulus sing on and care for nothing. They make songs for every occasion. If hunting a stray horse they sing about it, and when found, sing as they run home with it. As to the whites, they move in circles or grades, and in this place have more pride than piety.

I believe the experience of the Southern States of America will be repeated here within a few years, viz., "The blacks will put the whites to shame." We find the native children so thirsty for education that they will not keep at home when asked to, but come early and stay late, and study hard. We have beeu told they were all dull, but could show surprising copies of writing done by boys and girls whose education dated back but three weeks. One boy learned the alphabet in one night, and now reads in a second reader.

These bright boys and girls ought to be trained in some industrial Christian school, and after acting as pupils or teachers for some time at the school, and giving evidence of thorough conversion and deep piety, should be appointed to visit the "kraals," to preach to the raw heathen or to interpret for the missionary. We are planning to organize such an industrial school, and think we can get a grant of land in the "Native Reservation" for that purpose. I have sent word to the chief that each scholar must work one hour each day if we start a school for his tribe. I arranged with him before that uo scholar could use "utywala" (Zulu beer), or "gwae" (tobacco), while attending school. Such a proviso has made the natives wonder how it is that some other missionaries partake of these doubtful things. The explanation circulated is, that American Christians use neither beer or tobacco, and that the missionary means to make Americans out of them. I wish I could say that American Christians were straight on these things which to-day are a hindrance to the spread of the Gospel here.

Masonic lodges and other secret orders have regular meetings in the towns nearer the coast. Two of the Masonic lodges are advertised to meet "on or before full moon." This would seem to change their name from "sun worshipers" to "moonshiners." There may be need of moonlight, as I see the "Masonic Refreshment Bar" advertises that "a long-felt want is now supplied" in their choice wines, spirits and cigars.

I need some tracts to open people's eyes. They must be of that kind to attract the attention of thinking men, and contain the oaths of Masonry, and show the duty of Masons to renounce the same.

I have loaned "Secret Societies Illustrated," and rejoice that it did good. The copy was presented me by Bro. W. B. Stoddard at Akron, N. Y.

The institution here is aristocratic, and at present not as bold or defiant as at home; yet true "Blue Masonry" is the same doctrinally and practically. One has to be cautious in assertions when away from home, as there is much difference in lodge rules. For instance: When in England I saw a notice that a certain number would be received in the Odd-fellows lodge "without fees," in order to replenish the lodge, and a Mason told me he paid no initiation fees: and that the name of Jesus was not considered an innovation in his lodge. I believe a little seed here would bring a harvest in short time. Pray for us and God's cause here. Yours in Christ,

ROBERT SHEMELD.

ANOTHER PROBABLE EXODUS OF THE MORMONS.

BY PROF. S. M. HILL.

Mormonism cannot remain where Christian civilization has the ascendency. From Palmyra county, N. Y., Smith and his followers fled to Kirtland, Cayuga county, Ohio. That was their first exodus. Soon Kirtland became uncomfortably close, and an exodus was planned to western Missouri and a confederation with the Indians contemplated, that the Mormons might found a kingdom independent of the United States. But even Missouri was unfavorable, and when they were driven over its boundary lines by an enraged people, their pitiable condition awoke the sympathy of the citizens of Illinois, and a tract of land was offered them for a colony. Then they built Nauvoo and for ten years prosperity smiled upon them.

The polygamous practices of the leader then caused a split in the "Quorum of the Apostles." Two or three resolute spirits started a paper, the Nauvoo Expositor, as a means of redress for family wrongs and as a safeguard for the sanctity of family ties. This was mobbed by the leader; he was imprisoned and while in prison shot by an exasperated people. In less than a week's time they were forced to vacate their town, and crossed the Mississippi over to Iowa.

Now began their fourth exodus. It took them one year's time to cross Iowa. While in winter quarters in the vicinity of Omaha, one James C. Little went to President Polk and asked him whether 500 Mormons could not be enlisted for the Mexican war, as they contemplated going to California anyway. They were enlisted, their pay given in advance and they marched as U. S. soldiers across the plains. The rest of the company under Brigham Young's leadership went over and stopped in the Salt Lake valley, where a few of them had been the year before on a hunt for a location. Their plan was now to come so far west that the United States should never be able to reach them. But, alas! the very same year they made their first settlement there all that territory was ceded to the United States.

This same man, J. C. Little, has now called for another force of 500. This time they will take their familes with them and move down to Sonora, in Northern Mexico, to take possession of some 200,000 acres of land that he and one Samuel Brannan have purchased. It seems as if this would be the beginning of the fifth exodus of the Mormons, and now they might succeed in getting outside the jurisdiction of our government. They will, however, not be likely to leave Utah and the surrounding territories, but only arrange matters so that the Mormon leaders can have their headquarters outside of this country. The Utah Central railroad can easily be prolonged through Arizona into Mexico and to the head of the gulf of California. A confederation of the Yagoi Indians in alliance with the Mormons and the coveted goal of Mormonism, an independent, separate nation might soon enough be realized. The weak government of Mexico would not be as hard to fight as the United States government, and the pressure now exerted by Judge Zane's effective application of the Edmund law will very naturally make he Mormon look to some place of refuge. Will that be the end of the Mormon problem?

CHEAP IMMORTALITY.

BY PROF. O. F. LUMRY.

Yesterday's mail brought me a cabinet photograph bearing on one side the shadows of old-time friends and relations, and on the back, at the top, a representation of the safe to contain "Mosher's memorial offering to Chicago," which is described below as follows:

"1976."

"By special request, this Memorial Photograph was taken by Mr. Mosher for his great collection of portraits of prominent men and women; and when the collection is complete the photographs will be classified according to the profession of the persons represented, and deeded by Mr. Mosher, with memoirs and valuable statistics, to Chicago, and carefully laid away in a memorial safe, with its thousands of historical likenesses of the honored dead and living, will become a priceless treasure, and preserved with the archives of the city in the great vaults of the court-house, where suitable space has been awarded for it and approved of by Mayor Harrison, January 21st, 1880, and there to be kept for the second centennial, 1976."

In the deed mentioned above there is to be a request to have a memorial service held in Chicago every quarter of a century, from July 4, 1876; and the mayor of the city will be requested to provide a place for these portraits, memoirs and statisties, in a Memorirl gallery at the second and third anniversaries of American Independence. The statement continues:

"As nearly all the members of the Masonic bodies in Chicago are represented by their photographs in the collection, it seems most befitting for them to lay these memorial shadows away, as their brothers in 1966 will be requested in the deed to unlock the safe, take charge of the secret trust, the invaluable 'souvenir.'"

After giving notice of price of photo's and other connected matters the card goes on to say as follows:

"The above offering is heartily approved by Ex-Governor Cullom, Gen. Sheridan, Wm. Penn Nixon, James B. Bradwell, John A. Logan, David Davis, W. F. Story, Joseph Medill, Andrew Shreman, Washington Hesing and forty other as prominent men of the State. The safe is to be encased in thick layers of charcoal, to absorb all the dampness and injurious gasses, so the likenesses will last forever.

Over 5,300 persons have had memorial portraits taken and registered their names for the second centennial."

Perhaps the exhibition of cheek manifested here ought not to astonish any one accustomed to see the advertisement of the Ancient and Honorable order printed gratuitously on all the currency of the country, but he can not help wondering if the city of Chicago would be willing to be at the expense of building vaults to do a like service for the Christian churches of Chicago or the thousand and one other organizations that have an equally good claim to the like favor.

It occurs to me that this is a risky experiment after all. Suppose that within the century Masonry should come to be seen in its true light as a system of idolatry and a conspiracy to rule the state. Scan carefully the names and observe how many of them have become U. S. Senators, and perhaps you may get some idea of how they reached what used to be an honorable and exalted station.

May it not be that the men of a century hence will regard this as a veritable rogues' gallery?

LODGE THEOLOGY HARD TO BELIEVE.

BY REV. C. F. HAWLEY

In the course of my visitatious in Fayette county, Iowa, I called upon a minister of the Gospel who had been accustomed to see lodge men received to the fellowship of the church. I set before him the religious character of Freemasonry. I told him that according to the highest Masonic authority a man when he is made a Mason receives the "New birth;" and that these same Masonic oracles tell us that a Mason who lives in strict obedience to the obligations and preeepts of the fraternity is free from sin. It was difficult for the minister to believe that these representative Masons, who must be intelligent in regard to the principles of the order, really meant to teach that a man by passing through the ceremonies and faithfully observing the obligations and precepts of Masonry is freed from sin and fitted for heaven.

"But," said I, "they tell us that in becoming a Master Mason a man 'is raised from the grave of ignorance to the faith of salvation;' and that it 'inspires him with a good hope of that final reward which belongs alone to the just made perfect.' They tell us that there is all in the first three degrees of Masonry 'that the soul of man requires.'"

Still this good man queried as to whether these Masonic teachers did not mean that Masons were saved by Christ, and that Masonry merely helped them to be Christians.

I replied, "You know that every Master Mason who has been faithful to his obligations is entitled to a Masonic burial if he requests it. And you know that Jews, and Mohammedans, and pagans, and deists, and spiritualists, are admitted to Masonry as freely as though they were Christians. And you know that Masonry in her burial service expresses the same hope for the unbelieving, Christ-rejecting Jew, that it does for the Christian Mason who dies. And that the Mohammedan and pagan Masons are sent forward by the Masonic burial service to the grand lodge above in company with Jews and Christians. Now, if Masonry means that the Christian Masou is saved by his Christianity, then Masonry also means that the Jewish Mason is saved by his Judaism, and the Mohammedan Mason by his Mohammedism, and the pagan Mason by his paganism."

"Take," I said, "which horn of the dilemma you please. Admit that Masonry teaches that men may climb up to heaven by the practice of its ceremonies and obligations and precepts, and is, therefore, the rival of Christianity, which affirms that CHRIST is the only way to God and heaven; or else admit that Masonry in league with Satan, is seeking to exalt the false religions of the earth to an equality with our holy Christianity."

Masonry originally, and by its representative men teaches that men are saved by Masonry. And the wise men of Masonry teach that its religion is pure theism; that is, a deistical religion in which the Christ of God is utterly ignored and rejected.

Christ says, "I am the way, the truth, and the life; no man cometh unto the Father but by me." He pronounced those who seek to climb up some other way, thieves and robbers! And the Holy Ghost affirms, through Peter, that there is salvation by no other; "for there is no other name under heaven, given among men, whereby we must be saved."

If, then, Masonry means to teach that salvation is by Masonic ceremonies and the faithful observance of Masonic obligations it is an anti-Christ, seeking to dethrone Jesus Christ, the world's only hope. And, if Masonry only means to teach that one religion is just as good as another; that a pagan, or a Jew, or a Mohammedan, or a spiritualist, or a deist, is just as sure of heaven as a Christian; then Masonry has become the mouthpiece of Satan; and is in agreement with hell, and seeking to dethrone Jesus Christ, and exalt the god of this world, by granting passports to his worshipers, and sending them forward to the Grand Lodge above.

Shall the Christian church endorse men as Christians and ordain them as ministers who are wilfully engaged in this horrible conspiracy to dethrone Christ, and give his kingdom to Satan? O, shame!

Let every loyal friend of Jesus Christ utter his indignant protest.

THE SAMNITE LEGION.

From a letter by Hon. Richard Rush to Hon. John C. Spencer, March 8, 1831.

On the point of Masonic oaths I must beg you to turn to Livy, 10th book, section 38. Reading him a few evenings ago, I was much amused with falling upon a passage, the whole of which I would copy, but that it is too long. It is one in which he describes the linen legion of the Samnites. From this legion, those who contend for the antiquity of Masonry, may if they think fit, date its origin. It may at least supply their antiquarian researches with some good hints, for although not making such a stretch into backward time as the days of King Solomon, it leaps over John the Baptist. The Samnites being at war with the Romans, assembled their whole force at Aquilenia. A piece of ground in the middle of the camp was enclosed with hurdles and boards, and covered overhead with a linen cloth, the sides being all of an equal length. Within this enclosure sacrifices were performed, according to directions read out of an old linen book. When these were finished, the general ordered a beadle to summon every one of those who were most highly distinguished by their birth or conduct. Besides other solemnities calculated to impress the mind with religions awe, there were altars erected, about which lay the victims slain, and centurions stood around with their swords drawn. The soldier was led up to the altar, rather like a victim than a performer in the ceremony, and was bound by an oath not to divulge what he should see and hear in that place. He was then compelled to swear, in a dreadful kind of form, containing execrations on his own person, on his family, and race, if he did not go to battle whithesoever the commanders should lead; and if either he himself fled from the field, or, in case he should see any other flying, if he did not immediately kill him. At first, some, refusing to take this dreadful oath, were put to death round the altars, and their mangled remains lying among the carcasses of the victims, served as a warning to others not to refuse. At length the requisite number was obtained, and this legion, says Livy, sixteen thousand strong, was called the linen legion, from the covering of the enclosure. Its soldiers were furnished with painted and gilt shields, and plumed helmets. The Romans laughed at their empty parade, and were horror struck at their abominable oaths and sacrifices, polluted as the latter were with human blood mingled with that of cattle: and under Lucius Papirius Cursor, the renowned Roman leader, made quick work with the "linen legion," part were cut to pieces, and part put to flight.

May this prefigure the defeat of Masonry at the polls, under Wirt, as our Papirius Cursor; for surely it is alike ridiculous by its empty parades, alike odious by its abominable oaths, and has alike been polluted with human blood.

A DEFENCE OF THE BIBLE AS A SCHOOL-BOOK.

WRITTEN BY DR. BENJAMIN RUSH, FROM PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 10, 1791, AND ADDRESSED TO REV. JEREMY BELKNAP, BOSTON.

Dear Sir:—It is now several months since I promised to give you my reasons for preferring the Bible as a school-book, to all other compositions. I shall not trouble you with an apology for my delaying so long to comply with my promise, but shall proceed immediately to the subject of my letter.

Before I state my arguments in favor of teaching children to read by means of the Bible, I shall assume the five following propositions:

1. That Christianity is the only true and perfect religion, and that in proportion as mankind adopt its principles, and obey its precepts, they will be wise and happy.

2. That a better knowledge of this religion is to be acquired by reading the Bible than in any other way.

3. That the Bible contains more knowledge necessary to man in his present state than any other book in the world.

4. That knowledge is most durable, and religious instruction most useful, when imparted in early life.

5. That the Bible, when not read in schools, is seldom read in any subsequent period of life.

My arguments in favor of the use of the Bible as a school-book are founded:

I. In the constitution of the human mind.

1. The memory is the first faculty which opens in the minds of children. Of how much consequence, then, must it be, to impress it with the great truths of Christianity, before it is preoccupied with less interestiug subjects! As all the liquors which are poured into a cup generally taste of that which first filled it, so all the knowledge which is added to that which is treasured up in the memory of the Bible, generally receives an agreeable and uscful tincture from it.

2. There is a peculiar aptitude in the minds of children for religious knowledge. I have constantly found them in the first six or seven years of their lives more inquisitive upon religious subjects than upon any others; and an ingenious instructor of youth has informed me that he has found young children more capable of receiving just ideas upon the most difficult tenets of religion than upon the most simple branches of human knowledge. It would be strauge if it were otherwise; for God creates all his means to suit all his ends. There must of course be a fitness between the human mind and the truths which are essential to its happiness.

3. The influence of prejudice is derived from the impressions which are made upon the mind in early life. Prejudices are of two kinds, true and false. In a world where false prejudices do so much mischief, it would discover great weakness not to oppose them, by such as are true.

I grant that many men have rejected the prejudices derived from the Bible; but I believe no man ever did so without having been made wiser or better by the early operation of these prejudices upon his mind. Every just principle that is to be found in the writings of Voltaire is borrowed from the Bible; and the morality of the deists, which has been so much admired and praised, is, I believe, in most cases, the effect of habit, produced by early instruction in the principles of Christianity.

4. We are subject, by a general law in our nature, to what is called habit. Now, if the study of the Scriptures be necessary to our happiness at any time of our lives, the sooner we begin to read them the more we shall be attached to them; for it is peculiar to all the acts of habit to become easy, strong, aud agreeable by repetition.

5. It is a law in our natures that we remember longest the knowledge we acquire by the greatest number of our senses. Now, a knowledge of the contents of the Bible is acquired in school by the aid of the eyes and the ears; for children after getting their lessons, always say them to their masters in an audible voice; of course there is a presumption that this knowledge will be retained much longer than if it had been acquired in any other way.

6. The interesting events and characters, recorded and described in the Old and New Testaments, are accommodated above all others to seize upon all the faculties of the minds of children. The understanding, the memory, the imagination, the passions, and the moral powers, are all occasionally addressed by the various incidents which are contained in those divine books, insomuch that not to be delighted with them is to be devoid of every principle of pleasure that exists in a sound mind.

7. There is a native love of truth in the human mind. Lord Shaftesbury says that "truth is so congenial to our minds, that we love even the shadow of it;" and Horace, in his rules for composing an epic poem, establishes the same law in our natures, by advising the "fictions in poetry to resemble truth." Now, the Bible contaius more truths than any other book in the world; so true is the testimony that it bears of God in his works of creation, providence, and redemption, that it is called truth itself, by way of pre-eminence above things that arc only simply true. How forcibly are we struck with the evidence of truth, in the history of the Jews, above what we discover in the history of other nations? Where do we find a hero, or an historian, record his own faults or vices except in the Old Testament? Indeed, my friend, from some accounts I have read of the American Revolution, I begin to grow sceptical to all history except to that which is contained in the Bible. Now, if this book be known to contain nothing but what is materially true, the mind will naturally acquire a love for it from this circumstance; and from this affection for the truths of the bible, it will acquire a discernment of truth in other books, and a preference of it in all the transactions of life.

8. There is a wonderful property in the memory, which enables it in old age, to recover the knowledge it had acquired in early life, after it had been apparently forgotten for forty or fifty years. Of how much consequence, then, must it be, to fill the mind with that species of knowledge, in childhood and youth, which, when recalled in the decline of life, will support the soul under the infirmities of age, and smooth the avenues of aproaching death? The Bible is the only book which is capable of affording this support to old age; and it is for this reason we find it resorted to with so much diligence and pleasure by such old people who have read it in early life. I can recollect many instance of this kind in persons who discovered no attachment to the Bible in the meridian of their lives, who have notwithstanding, spent the evening of them, in reading no other book. The late Sir John Pringle, physician to the Queen of Great Britain, after passing a long life in camps and at courts, closed it by studying the Scriptures. So anxious was he to increase his knowledge in him, that he wrote to Dr. Michaels, a Professor of Divinity in Germany, for an explanation of a difficult text of Scripture, a short time before his death.

II. My second argement in favor of the use of the Bible in public schools, is founded upon an implied command of God, and upon the practice of several of the wisest nations of the world. In the sixth chapter of Deuteronomy, we find the following words, which are directly to my purpose: "And thou shalt love the Lord thy God, with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might. And these words which I command thee shall this day be in thy heart. And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thy house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up."

It appears, moreover, from the history of the Jews, that they flourished as a nation in proportion as they honored and read the books of Moses, which contained a written revelation of the will of God to the children of men. The law was not only neglected, but lost during the general profligacy of manners which accompanied the long and wicked reign of Manasseh. But the discovery of it, in the rubbish of the temple, by Josiah, and its subsequent general use, were followed by a return of national virtue and prosperity. We read further of the wonderful effects which the readiug of the law by Ezra, after his return from his captivity in Babylon, had upon the Jews. They hung upon their lips with tears, and showed the sincerity of their repentance by their general reformation.

The learning of the Jews for many years consisted in nothing but the knowledge of the Scriptures. These were the text-books of all the instruction that was given in the schools of their prophets. It was by means of this general knowledge of their law, that those Jews that wandered from Judea into other countries, carried with them and propagated certain ideas of the true God among all the civilized nations upon the face of the earth. And it was from the attachment they retained to the Old Testament, that they procured a translation of it into the Greek language, after they lost the Hebrew tongue by their long absence from their native country. The utility of this translation, commonly called the Septuagint, in faciliating the progress of the Gospel, is well-known to all who are acquainted with the history of the first age of the Christian church.

But the benefits of an early and general acquaintance with the Bible were not confined only to the Jewish nation. They have appeared in many countries in Europe since the Reformation. The industry and habits of order which distinguish many of the German nations are derived from their early instruction in the principles of Christianity by means of the Bible. The moral and enlightened character of the inhabitants of Scotland, and of the New Eugland States, appears to be derived from the same cause. If we descend from nations to sects, we shall find them wise and prosperous in proportion as they become early acquainted with the Scriptures. The Bible is still used as a school-book among the Quakers. The morality of this sect of Christians is universally acknowledged. Nor is this all, their prudence in the management of their private affairs, is as much a mark of their Society as their sober manners.

I wish to be excused from repeating here that if the Bible did not convey a single direction for the attainment of future happiness, it should be read in our schools in preference to all other books, from its containing the greatest portion of that kind of knowledge which is calculated to produce private and public temporal happiness.

We err not only in human affairs, but in religion likewise, only because "we do not know the Scriptures." The opposite systems of the numerous sects of Christians arise chiefly from their being more instructed in catechisms, creeds, and confessions of faith, than in the Scriptures. Immense truths, I believe, are concealed in them. The time, I have no doubt, will come, when posterity will view and pity our ignorance of these truths, as much as we do the ignorance of the disciples of our Saviour, who knew nothing of the meaning of those plain passages in the Old Testament which were daily fulfilling before their eyes. Whenever that time shall arrive, those truths which have escaped our notice, or, if discovered, have been thought to be opposed to each other, or to be inconsistent with themselves, will then, like the stones of Solomon's temple, be found so exactly to accord with each other, that they shall be cemented without noise or force into one simple and sublime system of religion.

But further, we err, not only in religion, but in philosophy likewise, because we "do not know or believe the Scriptures." The sciences have been compared to a circle of which religion composes a part. To understand any one of them perfectly, it is necessary to have some knowledge of them all. Bacon, Boyle, and Newton, included the Scriptures in the inquiries to which their universal geniuses disposed them and their philosophy was aided by thowledge in them. A striking agreement has been lately discovered between the history of certain events recorded in the Bible and some of the operations and productions of nature, particularly those which are related in Whitehurst's "Observations on the Deluge," in Smith's account of the origin of the variety of color in the human species, and in "Bruce's Travels." It remains yet to be shown how many other events, related in the Bible, accord with some late important discoveries in the principle of medicine. The events and the principles alluded to, mutually establish the truth of each other. From the discoveries of the Christian philosophers, whose names have been last meutioned, I have been led to question whether most harm has been done to revelation, by those divines who have unduly multiplied the objects of faith, or by those deists who have unduly multiplied the objects of reason, in explainiug the Scripfuers?

The Hebrew word which is translated prophesy meant to bubble up and pour forth as a fountain. The enthusiast bubbles up with the Spirit of God within him, and it pours forth from him like a fountain. The word prophecy is misunderstood. Many suppose it is limited to mere prediction; that is but the lesser portion of prophecy. The greater work is to reveal God.—Walt Whitman in the North American Review.

In closing the eyes for the nightly rest it is good to say, "He giveth his beloved sleep;" and in opening them, when night is past, to say, "When I awake I am still with Thee."

THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE IN MASSACHUSETTS.

BY REV. HENRY T. CHEEVER.

WORCESTER, MASS., Oct. 28, 1885.

What may possibly prove to be a tidal wave in the temperance reformation, has been recently set in motion at a crowded meeting in this city, addressed by Principal Roe, of the Worcester High School. He briefly reviewed the century since the pampelet of Dr. Benjamin Rush, of Philadelphia, in 1785, dwelling largely upon the semi-centennial epoch in 1835, made by the Deacon Giles' distillery affair in old Salem, and the street outrage upon, and incarceration of Rev. George B. Cheever in the Salem jail for that famous dream.

Mr. Roe read with marked effect the two world-known articles entitled "Deacon Giles' Distillery," and "Deacon Jones' Brewery," and then supplemented those notable documents of the young Salem divine with an interesting address; in the course of which he spoke of the great advance of public sentiment within the last fifty years on the temperance question, as manifested in social and church life, in politics and legislation. In closing, he strongly advocated the keeping up of an uncompromising agitation till the liquor traffic is thoroughly outlawed, and the liquor curse fairly lifted from burdened humanity.

Your correspondent offered a declaration deprecating the present lamentable temperance apostasy in the commonwealth of Massachusetts, and urging that the policy of the State be changed from legislative license to constitutional suppression, and pledging the large assembly to continual agitation for the prohibition, by amendment of the State Constitution, of the baleful traffic till its downfall is secured.

The admirable article of the late Rev. George Allen, of this city, the noted Anti-mason, was referred to in defense of Dr. Cheever against the charge of intemperate writing. Some of its incisive sentences of fifty years ago will bear repeating here:

"Many have been, and more have affected to be, shocked at the rash hand which Mr. Cheever has put on 'Deacon Giles' Distillery,' who have ever been calm as clocks, and whose placid tempers could never have been ruffled by any amount of evil, however near or long continued, which that distillery may have brought on individuals, or on the community.

"That distillery may eat up the bread of poverty, dissipate the treasures of the rich, wreck the hopes of skillful enterprise and patient industry. It may bury the hardy children of the sea down in her fathomless caves; it may bring under the hammer the shop, the farm, the once happy dwelling. It may scatter the loving family, once grouped with mutual joy around the cheerful fire, but now to have no more a common home and the accustomed sweets of home-bred life. It may suck out, with a vampire's grasp, the life-blood of whole households, and lay waste the noblest gifts of mind. It may people the poor-house, the dreary refuge of the maniac, or the gloomy walls where crime is bound in fetters and doomed to still more fearful solitude. Or, not content with its desolations and woes on this side the grave, it may send them onward into the invisible domains beyond it. But no voice may lift up a cry of alarm; or if cowering fear shall give leave to speak at all, it must be in accents so bland, in words so courteous, in phrases so abstract and circuitous, that nobody shall know who, or hardly what, is meant. And if one thunders out, or writes in blazing fire, 'Thou art the man!' he who thus rashly ventures to lay hold on another's conscience, and rouse the slumbering from their fatal rest, is stigmatized 'as the chief of sinners,' and is made the scape-goat for all subsequent sins which an incensed press may choose to lay on his devoted head.

"Mr. C. has done, so far as taste is concerned, what the great masters of the human heart have always done. Homer, Virgil, Dante, Tasso, Spencer, Shakespeare, Milton and Bunyan took counsel of their own genius when they personified the vices which beset our race, and fixed in the mind unsteady images of evil by endowing them with the attributes of supernatural agents.

"After all the bluster about the cause of temperance going back, its friends have nothing to fear but cowardice in their own ranks. They ought to expect the final battle to be the hardest fought, remembering that

> 'Evils which take leave,
> In their departure most of all show evil.'"

In this connection let me offer for the Cynosure a report, yet unpublished, which your correspondent was led to make at the late Conference of Congregational churches, in Worcester county, after these terms:

"There is one department of Christian work by the churches of this Conference, upon which I beg leave to report a minute, supplementary to the general report to which we have just listened; my own mind being greatly burdened in regard to it, as doubtless the minds of others in the Conference may be likewise. I wish to offer a minute in reference to one of the greatest evils in society that now confronts, not merely our Congregationalism, but Christianity itself, in terms follows:

"'Whereas, in our work as churches the domestic liquor traffic is found to be the deadliest foe to the success of Christianity and to the well-being of the common people, which Christianity has now to meet; therefore, loyalty to Christ, on the part of the churches of this Conference, requires an earnest and continuous agitation for the thorough suppression of this anti-Christian traffic. And this Conference holds that the act of city aldermen, and of selectmen of the towns in licensing such a demoralizing traffic, is deserving of gravest rebuke in the pulpit and of discipline in the church.'

"Let me say in support of this, that enthusiastic loyalty to Christ should be as lightning from heaven to the institution or practice, whatever it be, that keeps men from coming to Christ. Fervent zeal for God and man is consuming fire to whatever agency dishonors God and destroys man. The church and the liquor traffic are in deadly antagonism because, while the one is the body of Christ for man's salvation, the other is Satan's chief agency for human corruption and the ruin of men's bodies. Protection or indulgence to the liquor traffic is, therefore, treachery to Christ; while fidelity to Christ means nothing short of overthrow and annihilation to that infamous business. It is, therefore, for the Christian church and ministry everywhere to lead in the temperance reform, and to carry it on to victory, both by moral and legal suasion, and by constitutional and statutory prohibition, in the interest of humanity, morals and true religion."

While on the general subject of church obligations and benevolence, it is in place to say that a report lately presented to one of the churches of this city on benevolence and benevolent societies, comparing the charities of the church with the most extolled and boasted of the secret orders, finds that the cost of running the American Missionary Society is but five per cent. of all the receipts, while the cost of running the Odd-Fellow's society is forty per cent. Let their thinking men judge where it is safest and most economical to invest what they have to bestow.

N. C. A. BOARD MEETING.

A called meeting of the National Christian Association was held Saturday morning at 10 o'clock. There were present J. L. Barlow, O. F. Lumry, John Gardner, T. H. Gault, Alex. Thomson, M. C. Ranseen, and C. A. Blanchard. The chairman, Rev. Joseph Travis, being absent, Prof. Lumry presided.

The principal business was financial, respecting the settlement of an estate in Iowa, the General Agent being instructed to examine particularly into its condition immediately. Rev. E. Mathews was donated his account for books and subscriptions, amounting to nearly $9. Rev. C. S. Harris of Jackson, Miss., spoke, by request, briefly of his acquaintance with the Memphis pastors and Rev. H. Woodsmall, the agent of the Baptist Missionary Society, whom he regarded as an excellent man, and well fitted to undertake work for the N. C. A. in the South. That work he believed must be now to turn back the Baptist and Methodist churches, and especially the former, from the lodge. Elder Barlow was requested by vote to correspond with Bro. Woodsmall. The Board also recommended the case of Rev. R. N. Countee to the friends of Christian reform.

PERSONAL MENTION.

—Rev. C. S. Harris, who spoke eloquently at the Madison meeting of the American Missionary Association and at Wheaton, has held the offices of Grand Lecturer and Deputy Grand Master of the Mississippi colored Masonic Grand Lodge.

—Bro. Henry G. Foster, our correspondent at Bellefontaine, Ohio, was not long since called to mourn the loss of a beloved wife, who died at the early age of twenty-four years, after a brief but painful illness.

—Rev. E. J. Grinwell, long located in Iowa as pastor of Wesleyan churches, has lately removed to Kishwaukee, Ill., where he preaches in the Wesleyan church.

—Rev. Joseph Travis, president of the N. C. A. Board, was once a member of the Masonic lodge, and was present in lodge and assisted at the initiation of Louis Kossuth, the Hungarian patriot, who was not made a Mason until most of his work was done and he got to this country.

—Rev. H. D. Inman, well known among the Wesleyan churches of Michigan, has been engaged as associate editor of the new denominational monthly, the Missionary Enterprise, published by Rev. Joel Martin at Pittsford, Mich. This paper is true to the reform principles of the Wesleyan brethren.

—Rev. C. S. Harris of the American Missionary Association church in Jackson, Miss., and well acquainted with brethren Elliott at Selma, Burke of Mobile, and the brethren at Memphis, has arranged to speak Monday evening at Wheaton on the Memphis outrage and the lodges that cause it.

Masonic Ku-Klux Warnings—The Wounded Persons Improving—Aid Needed for Bro. Countee's Church—The Press and Authorities Ignore Assassination and Outrage.

MEMPHIS, Oct. 28, 1885.

Editor Cynosure:

DEAR SIR AND BRO:—You will pardon me for again asking space in your valuable paper, to say a few words relating to our present condition, and the state of affairs in our city, which is of late gaining considerable notoriety by the secretists assuming the role, first, of midnight mobbers, and secondly, of midnight-premeditated, cool blooded murderers; and we look forward by the grace of God and ask, "what next?"

At the time of the first assault we concluded I was not safe so far away from my church, and that continual walking to and fro to my suburban residence would give them a chance to ambush me; but we had no idea that they were so low and degraded as to attempt an assault on me in company with so many. But it came, and we rejoice in the power of God that we escaped fatal injury.

It is now determined that I should, and must, live in town. No one wanted to rent a place, and after hard trial the members have succeeded in getting me a temporary shelter until our parsonage is erected, upon which they commenced work this Wednesday morning. The work will cost $1,600; one thousand of which we can raise among ourselves, and would be glad to have our friends help us about $600, in the next 30 days, and then would be in a place of comparative safety, in the churchyard. We were moved yesterday, and are now in the city. Already they are trying to induce the man, from whom the house is rented, to put us out; but he is a Catholic, and so far he has refused to do as they wish.

The city papers, with only one exception, to a certain extent seem to endorse all that has been done. Scarcely anything is said about bringing the perpetrators of these inhuman monsters to justice, and they seem to be growing worse and worse. They have sent to Rev. W. A. Brinkley two notices; one threatening him with death, and the other ordering him to leave the city in two weeks. Rev. B. A. Imes has also been ordered to go away. But they, like myself, have resolved to stand up and hew to the line, let the chips fall where they may. God nerves me, it seems, for battle. Several of the members of the church have quit, and others will leave. When I brand all the secretists as murderers, they become angry; but I do not fail to give them the truth as it is in Christ Jesus, our blessed Saviour, who spoke nothing in secret. I am engaged in this work and I am content that the battle is the Lord's and he will see that it is carried on to victory; and the fact is the victory is already ours.

I am suffering considerable to-day with pain from the wound in my head which heals very slowly. My brother also is quite feeble. It is cloudy, and threatening rain, and we suppose this accounts for our ills to-day. The lady is getting along nicely, and we believe by the grace of God and the prayers of a Christian people that we will soon recover.

I thank you and all good people for your sympathy, and the interest you have taken in allowing contributions to be sent you for us. Bro. Sutton, a subscriber for your paper, wrote me to-day, enclosing $5.00; which makes $38.50 I have received. He advises that I state how much we need to complete our work, through your paper, believing it would do much good. So I comply with his request.

May Christians everywhere pray for us.

REFORM NEWS.

—Bro. Hawley, the Iowa agent, is planning county conventions in Morning Sun, Louisa county, Nov. 16th and 17th, and in Crawfordsville, Washington county, Nov. 23 to 25.

FROM THE GENERAL AGENT.

WASHINGTON, Iowa, Oct. 26, 1885.

Friday and Saturday last I spent at Fairfield with our friend, Wm. Elliott, whose long and useful record entitles him to the respect of his neighbors who with him have developed the agricultural wealth of Jefferson county and grown up with the country. No attention was wanting on his part, or on the part of his most estimable wife to render my brief stay in every way enjoyable. This aged couple are now living alone aud find that the eare of more than two thousand acres of farm land is a burden to which they feel inadequate at "three score and ten," and are prepared to divide their responsibilities with any who wish to purchase good improved land in this State.

Sabbath morning I attended Bible-class and preached in the Free Methodist church, and after an interval profitably spent with Bro. Geo. Heaton and family, spoke in the evening. The house was filled, and all seemed attentive while I spoke an hour and a quarter from the text, "He hath a devil and is mad, why hear ye him." Duty seemed to forbid my going to meet and greet our friends at Birmingham, and I came on to this reform center by a short hour's ride. Bro. Geo. Brokaw is absent with his afflicted companion, but Dr. McCelland, James Dawson, and Dr. Maughlin extend a hearty welcome and have shown me much kindness.

After my evening discourse there came to me a young man studying in Parsons College, and asked for tracts such as I had heen distributing on the street. I was glad to furnish the limited supply I had, and hope they will prove good seed sown among the one hundred and more pupils in that institution. Having completed the object of my call at this place, I am waiting for a train to give me the luxury of an all-night ride to Chicago. J. P. STODDARD.

IOWA.

FAYETTE COUNTY ORGANIZED.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—The week after the Wesleyan Methodist conference at West Union, I began to work up the Fayette county couvention. In company with Judge Rogers, a friend of our reform, I visited the county officers and secured the court house. I visited also the friends in various parts of the county, distributing literature and encouraging them to rally to the convention.

While doing this work I passed through the adjoining county of Chickasaw and preached two sermons and gave two lectures.

The Fayette County Convention was a success. A County Christian Association was organized to continue the discussion of the relations of Freemasonry and kindred orders to the Christian religion, the family, and the state, which was begun in the convention.

The Association is also formed for radical temperance and prohibition work, and for the promotion of all Christian reforms in church and state. It is well officered, and no doubt, with the blessing of God, will have a vigorous life, and do a good work.

Secretary Stoddard wrought wondrously in the convention. I was led to ask in my heart, "What meat doth this our Cæsar eat, that he hath grown so great?" I was delighted, and at times surprised at the beauty and grandeur and strength of his efforts. He will find a warm welcome in Iowa, while I conduct the campaign against the lodge here.

Let all the friends of Jesus pray for the success of the Fayette County Christian Association. Will not those who love righteousness and hate iniquity co-operate with me in getting up conventions and organizing county associations to carry forward the work of Christian reform all over the State of Iowa? Do not fear that it will hinder successful revival work. If we do our duty in exposing and withstanding and removing the twin curses, the lodge and the saloon, and actively favor all Christian reforms in church and state, and are not personally sinful, we may expect to have access to God through Christ the Mediator for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, and a general revival of the work of God. There is no conceivable reason why God will not hear prayer and pour out his Spirit and flood the land with salvation, only, that sin has hid his face from his church, that he will not hear them.

Let us then hold conventions and organize associations to promote in every right way all Christian reforms, that our prayers be not hindered, and see if God will not rain righteousness upon us until the beautiful State of Iowa becomes the garden of the Lord, and this great country becomes Immanuel's land.

Brethren, pray for me. C. F. HAWLEY.

OHIO.

CHEERING NEWS FOR THE COLUMBUS CONVENTION.

COLUMBUS, Oct. 28, 1885.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—Since my last report I have been very busy looking up new friends, enlisting old ones, and arranging for a series of meetings. My appointments are as follows: Friday and Saturday evenings, in the United Presbyterian church, Reynoldsburg; Sabbath and Monday evenings in the United Brethren church, southeast of Reynoldsburg; Tuesday and Wednesday evenings in the Wesleyan Methodist church near Alexandria. I shall ask each of these churches to appoint delegates to attend the December State convention.

I listened to a most excellent sermon on Sabbath morning preached by Bro. C. W. Hiatt: his text, "Thy kingdom come." Among other things, he said, "Before Christ's kingdom will come, there will be a great unyoking of those who are unequally yoked together." He spoke with great power.

Yesterday I had the pleasure of calling on the President and several of the professors in the Capital University. They were all pleased to know of of our anticipated meeting here, and said they would do all they could consistent with other duties, to help forward the work. They have a good school. The attendance is reported increasing.

Last evening I spoke to a few of our United Brethren friends who gathered at the home of Bro. C. D. Evaus. They also are enlisted for the war. Mr. C. M. Strickler of Clearport cheered us by a eall. He has been a reader of the Cynosure for several years, and is doing what he can to promote our principles in his section. He accompanied me to the office of the Home Gazette, which is the leading Prohibition paper of this section. Mr. L. E. Murphey, the publisher of this paper, made us very welcome, assured us that he did not believe in having any fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, and kindly consented to advertize our meetings and assist the work in any way that he could. Mr. A. Ream, of Ada, O., was in the office. He will attend the meeting and get all that he can to come from his section. Rev. McFarlin, pastor of a Baptist church here, said, "I am in sympathy with you and will try and attend the meeting."

Please write me, friends, what you are doing in your section. If you have delegates appointed from the churches where you attend please send me their names, so that we can arrange for entertainment as far as possible. Let us commence to work for the success of this meeting in time and God will give us a grand victory over the powers of darkness.

THE REFORM CONVENTION AT WEST UNION, IOWA.

The State agent of the Iowa Christian Association, Rev. C. F. Hawley, after attending the Wesleyan conference at West Union remained a short time in Fayette county to work up the cause of reform. Arrangements were made for a county convention, and the services of Rev. J. P. Stoddard were secured.

The attendance was not large, but was mostly persons of considerable influence over the couutry, as Rev. J. P. Wilson, presiding elder of this district of the United Brethren church; Rev. N. E. Gardner, pastor of the United Brethren church of West Union; Judge J. W. Rogers; W. R. Morley, of Brush Creek, and C. N. Fox and others from Elgin. The General Agent of the National Christian Association spoke with his characteristic clearness, and showed the utter incongruity of this self-declared "ancient" and "honorable" institution with the divinely appointed institutions of the family, the Christian religiou and the state.

Rev. C. F. Hawley gave the false religions a heavy bombardment by selecting from the best Masonic authors their own professions which were of sufficient weight to cause the lodge to tremble as these solid shots were discharged against its ancient (?) walls.

A county association, auxiliary to the State Christian Association, was formed in which the following officers were chosen: President, Rev. J. P. Wilson; Vice-president, Mrs. W. R. Morley; Secretary, Chas. R. Hunt; Treasurer, J. A. Iliff.

The committee on resolutions, consisting of Revs. J. P. Stoddard, N. E. Gardner, and J. P. Wilson, gave the following report which was adopted:

Resolved, 1. That we reaffirm our devotion to the cause of constitutioual prohibition of the mauufacture, importation, sale, or use of intoxicating liquors, and we pledge ourselves to use all lawful means to secure their entire abolition from our county, State. and the Nation.

2. That we believe the secret lodge system to be anti-Christian and anti-republican and, by the covenant of partiality existing between its members, a fruitful source of corruption in our civil courts and a strong ally of the liquor curse, which we are in duty bound to oppose and expose.

3. That we heartily commend the proposed Christian couference of evangelical churches to consider the character of the system of Secret Societies and its influence upon the church of Christ and civil government, and to recommend such action as may be deemed proper for its removal.

The report of the committee upon permanent organization was received and adopted item by item, and it is hoped will secure co-operation and unity amoug the friends of Prohibitiou, Government Reform and opposition to secret societies.

If we now will but use this ingenious organization as is designed, we cannot fail to accomplish good. Let us adopt as our motto in this work the words of Tertullian, bishop of Carthage, in oue of his bold Christian apologies addressed to the Roman Emperor: "What you call our obstinacy is an instructor. For who that sees it does not inquire for what we suffer? Who that inquires does not embrace our doctrines? Who that embraees them, is not ready to give his blood for the fullness of God's grace?" The conflict is forced upon us and we cannot render our own position secure without comprehending, assaulting, and disclosing to all the position of the foe arrayed against the kingdom of Christ. CHAS. R. HUNT, Sec'y.

CORRESPONDENCE.

OTSEGO LODGES AND CHURCHES.

The assertiou that seeret societies are destructive of the church is apparently eonfirmed by the experience of Schuyler's Lake, N. Y., as traced in the "History of Otsego County" and the statements of other writers. The Baptist church in that village eontained forty-five members at the time of the Morgau assassination, and 235 were added during the twenty-five years preceding 1853, embracing the period the Masonic lodge was extinct or dormant, indicating a membership of upwards of an hundred at that date. During the twenty-five years subsequent to 1853, at which time the lodge began to revive, but twenty-two were added, and in 1878. the date of the work, it was reduced to thirty-three members. Nor have other denominations fared better, for four of them, although formerly prosperous, now contain but seventy-nine members, making a total of 112 professing Christians in a village of 300 inhabitants and three or four miles of surrounding country. The Christian sect has beeome extinct; the Freewill Baptists merely retain their organization to hold church property, while the Methodists and Baptists are supported by reciprocal attendance at services and the contributions of the general public. On the other hand the lodge attained a membership of seventy-two in 1878, but as the family is usually represented by its head alone, therein, and in the church by two or three of its members, it is apparent that the former embraces more families than the latter, and that the predominant religion of Schuyler's Lake and vicinity is Masonic with Christless prayers and sun-worship formulas.

That the condition is not better iu the whole country is evident from the following comments of the Freeman's Journal of Cooperstown, on the Baptists of Otsego:

"The association now numbers seventeen churches—Bridgewater, not having reported for several years past, and last year estimated as having only twenty members, is this year dropped from the list. Three other churches this year make no report and were not represented. The total membership is given at 1,593, of whom not less than 200 are non-residents, leaving scarcely 1,400 resident members not all of whom are regular attendants on church meetings, or contributors toward church expenses. . .

"Too many of late years seldom, if ever, put in an appearance at any religious service, except occasionally to attend a funeral. The churches are sustained by the few, and for the beuefit of the many. Close their doors for one year, and all the material interests of Otsego county, agricultural included, would deteriorate and in time be utterly ruined."

If the writer will state the damages which will be entailed by the total ruin of the church in the country, the loss to Schuyler's Lake from the lodge may be computed, for in numbers and spirituality there has been a great diminution. Mr. Cook, one of its pastors, after ordination was here initiated into fellowship with a prominent Mason, the secretary of the lodge, who boasts himself a deist and places a well-worn copy of Payne's "Age of Reason" before the Bible, and another who denies man a soul and a future life.

Full statistics are not given, but in 1835 one of the Baptist churches of Burlington contained as many members as the three at the present time. As the township contains two prosperous Masonic besides other lodges, the cause is obvious, but blinded by custom, the journalist is unable to see that such associations are destructive of the church by their multiplied expenses, distracting pageantries, and substitutions for Christian religion, and that its present state is due to their prevalence and influence as in the justification of assassins and dynamiters. Not only in Schuyler's Lake, but throughout the whole country, the Anti-masonic period was a season of protracted revivals, which proves that the lodge is an incubus on the church, as among the Jews, when even the priests were captivated by Baalism. The school-house meetings are becoming traditions of the past or being substituted by granges or Good Templar lodges. Fat lodges make lean churches.

This same paper, though adverse to the war, presumably to pander to public opinion, urged veterans to join Grand Army posts. Yet many are withdrawing as in the Oneonta post, which initiated seventy-eight between 1871 and 1878, but merely retained its original number of twenty at the end of that period—a strange abandonment of purchased benefits and apparently conclusive evidence of fraud.

It is said that the corner-stone of a Baptist church at Clarksville, built in 1825, bears the emblems of Freemasonry, which should be a warning to those who seek pecuniary gain or political influence by the flattery of the lodge, for in one brief year it was in disgrace for the murder of Morgan, and the Baptists of Schuyler's Lake among others subscribed to the Whitesbury resolutions against the order. And that all these secret associations are substantially identical or have a common directorship is shown by the election to its offices by the United Workman lodge in Unadilla of half the high priests and other titled members of the chapter of Royal Arch Masons, proving the organization of the former an expedient for the acquisition of universal dominion without sacrificing Masonic caste—as remarkably as the initiation to the seventh degree in the same place in 1822 of three ministers in a three days' session at a cost of two dollars each.

On the other hand, notwithstanding the admission of the necessity of home missionaries, it condemns the Salvation Army as a nuisance to be abated, although it is a useful, if not a necessary expedient to reach the masses in many places, as some are repelled from the churches by poverty or otherwise; and although Christ was a revivalist, preaching in open places, and cleared the temple of money lenders in the same manner as his modern followers are purifying London of moral lepers. Their parade and music are not more objectionable than those of the Masonic corner-stone laying, the original signification of which is said to be the propitiation of evil spirits; but paganism is approved, and indignant Christianity reproached. It is safe to castigate the weak!

This paper published Weed's letter, but as if appalled by its boldness, it apologizes with the assurance that the Morgan affair was the sole blot on the otherwise fair escutcheon of Freemasonry. As the public instructor and guardian of liberty it violates every obligation by statements which mislead and are refuted by the assassinations of Smith of Vermont, Hunter of Massachusetts, Murdock of New York, Ritchie of Pennsylvania, Gavil of Ohio, Hammond of Kentucky, Neil of Tennessee, Brownlee of Illinois, Forgee of Canada, Miller of Ireland, the author of Jachin and Boaz of England, in 1775, and of Priest and Pritchard in 1730, and others, which with the French Revolution attest uniformity and universality. Likewise in the denunciation of socialism, the fact is ignored by this sheet that it is a copy of older societies, which practice legal robbery and murder by more secret means. But the press is blind to lodge drills and murders of higher classes, because patriotism is subordinated to profit.

In noticing anti-natal infanticide it states on the authority of a "leading physcian" that the evil is far more prevalent than commonly supposed. Before the rise of Christianity the exposure or destruction of infants was so common and so disregarded, as in heathen countries at the present time, that in combatting the practice the new religion was compelled to coin a word for its designation (Bishop Trench on the Study of Words, Sec. V.). Consequently the inference is that there is less of the substance and more of the shadow of Christianity than formerly, and that the fosterage of the Masonic lodge,—self-confessed paganism, with burials, baptisms, dedications and temples, and its progeny, Jack-mason manufactories by the press, has borne fruit. Num. 25. Jer. 7, 31. Gehenna and Tophet, (see Webster's Unabridged.)

The "History of Otsego County" has been condemned for paucity of fact, but closely studied it contains much food for reflection. In its pages the name of an ancestor has been made to adorn the first Masonic lodge in the county, but, taught by the lessons of the Morgan tragedy, the stigma has been removed by two generations of Anti masons. *

LODGE FRUIT.

A member of the G. A. R. tried to induce my boy to join the Sons of Veterans. He said, "Bring your father's discharge papers to show you are the son of a discharged soldier." The boy told him, "Father is opposed to secret societies and would not lend his papers for such a purpose." Then he tried to persuade the boy to take my papers secretly and join without letting me know anything about it.

I have no feeling of personal hatred toward this or any other man in or out of a secret society; but must say that he was actuated by the principles of the G. A. R., and shows one of its fruits to be to teach children to be "disobedient to parents." Little secret societies are like the little foxes that destroy the tender vines. The fruit of all the secret societies is every evil work. They are all dominated the lodge. It is the synagogue of Satan, for it rejects Christ and has no respect for the family, church or state. BIBLE LESSONS.

FOURTH QUARTER.

STUDIES IN THE KINGS AND PROPHETS.

LESSON VII. Nov. 15, 1885.—Effect of Jonah's Preaching. Jonah 3: 1–10.

GOLDEN TEXT.—The men of Nineveh shall rise up in judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it: for they repented at the preaching of Jonas; and behold, a greater than Jonas is here. Luke 11: 32.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

COMMENTS ON THE LESSON BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. The fruits of Jonah's discipline,—a new spirit of faith and obedience. Jonah proved his repentance to be sincere by the alacrity with which he obeyed God's second call—the only touchstone by which to test a genuine sorrow for sin. Note the wording of the message:—"Preach unto it the preaching that I bid thee." Every pastor, every Sunday school teacher, every man, woman or child enlisted in Christ's service, may feel that this command is personally directed to themselves. We must speak the word God gives us though popular opinion should forbid, and command us to speak another. It must be the word given to us. There were other prophets in Israel, yet Jonah, and Jonah only, is singled out to go and preach to vast, wicked, idolatrous Nineveh. Many Christians are so zealous in some one particular branch of service as to forget that others may be equally called of God to very different work. One takes up foreign missions, another chooses to spend his time and money in home evangelization, or labors for temperance, or in the anti-secrecy cause; while still another works for the bodies of men in schemes of philanthrophy and practical benevolence. All, if animated by Christ's Spirit, have one end in view. Difference in talents, in mental bent, or the environment of circumstances must give to each one a different mission, and the only important questions to be raised are these: Is it God's call that I hear? Is that call to me?

Only national repentance can avert national punishments. vs. 5–10. The king's proclamation, "Let them turn every one from his evil way, and from the violence that is in their hands," proves that Jonah actually preached to the Ninevites. His warning cry would have been meaningless to their ears unless accompanied by plain declarations of their sin as the cause of the threatened judgment. We know not what punishments may be prepared for our own guilty nation, but it is certain as if a Jonah had come and preached to us that only a revival of national righteousness can save our Republic from the many disintegrating forces which are now at work against her, and in view of which the Christian patriot can only "cry mightily to God." A religion that is kept for private life and never carried into public affairs has no conserving power. It degenerates into practical atheism.

LIGHT FROM THE WORD.

How is Nineveh described in the Bible? Na. 3–1. Is one department of Christian work really any more honorable than another? 1 Cor. 12.

NINEVEH.—The capital of Assyria. It was situated on the Tigris and was founded by Asshur (Gen. 10: 11; marginal, nimrod). It was to Western Asia what the Paris of Louis XIV. was to Europe; not to imitate it was to be provincial.—Geikie. Against its luxury and corruption the prophets testify—Isaiah, Jonah, Nahum, and Zephaniah. Rawlinson fixes the date of its downfall, 625; Layard, 606 B. C. A great flood in the Tigris undermined the wall (Nahum 2: 6). The king, Sardanapalus VII., after a stout defence against his enemies, destroyed himself, with his wives and treasures. So completely did it fall into decay before the historic era that no trustworthy ancient description of it or its monuments is found. The ruins of Nineveh.—The city may almost be said to stand before us again in the light of the remains restored by modern discovery.—H. B. Hackett. Excavations made by Layard, Botta and others, have revealed buildings, obelisks, sculptures, colossal figures, pottery, ornaments, cylinders, seals. Many inscriptions have come to light, including whole libraries of baked clay cylinders and stone tablets. All these discoveries of things hidden for ages confirm the Bible. Religion.—A sort of star or sun-god worship; like the religion of all of Western Asia, it was profoundly gross and sensual. Their chief divinity was the deified patriarch, Asshur. Character.—The race was war like, cruel, treacherous, proud and insolent.

"The second time." The first time he disobeyed the word of the Lord. Now, humble, repentant, he is much better fitted to do the work appointed him. God gave to Jonah what he often withholds from others—a second opportunity to perform a neglected duty.—Keil. Like St. Peter (John 21: 15–17), Jonah is not only forgiven, but restored to his office, and receives anew his commission.—Perowne. He shall best preach salvation who has known his own need of it. The result of Jonah's experience under trouble was, salvation is of the Lord (2: 9). —Spurgeon.

"That great city." Calvin explains this repeated expression as intended to prepare Jonah for the magnitude of the task before him. But perhaps the true key is to be found in Jonah 4: 11, where the same expression occurs as an argument for God's compassion.—Perowne.

"Three days' journey." About 60 miles. This must refer to the circumference of the city and not to the length. Two ancient historians have described Nineveh as 50 miles in circumference, and surrounded with a wall so thick that six chariots could be driven abreast upon its top, and having 15,000 towers each nearly 240 feet in height. These statements have been supposed to be gross exaggerations, especially as these historians have been convicted of misstatements on other points; but the present indications are that the statements of these historians are not altogether unworthy of respect. Four great heaps of ruins, two of them 20 miles apart, have been explored; and there has been much discussion as to which of them represents Nineveh. The latest tendency of scholars is toward the belief that they were different palaces included within the same city limits. Rawlinson himself admits that all the ruins may have formed part of "that group of cities which in the time of the prophet Jonah was known by the common name of Nineveh." The circumference of the area within which these heaps of ruins lie is nearly 60 miles; this exactly corresponds with the statement of Diodorus Siculus, that the circuit of the walls was nearly 60 miles.—Todd.

"Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown." Day after day he stood and preached that terrible word of the Lord. Ah! the Jonah who at last went to Nineveh was a glorious man, a sublime man, a giant in moral stature, and should fully atone in our regard for all the defects of the Jonah who did not go at first, and who afterward exhibited human weakness.

"Believed God." It was not necessary to the effect of his preaching that Jonah should be of the religion of Nineveh. I have known a Christian priest frighten a whole Mussulman town to tears and repentance by publicly proclaiming that he had received a divine commission to announce a coming earthquake or plague.—Layard Three things their faith certainly embraced. They believed in the God of the Hebrews as the true God. They believed in his power to execute the threat which he had held out. They believed in his mercy and willingness to forgive the penitent. "So great faith" had not been found, "no, not in Israel."—Perowne. Their consciences responded to the charge of guilt. Remorse for the wrong and robbe y and violence of many generations was awakened.—Stanley.

"Let man and beast be covered with sackcloth." This fast has probably no exact parallel in history. Yet in all ages men have been wont to extend the outward signs of their joy or sorrow to everything under their control—dress, equipage, etc. The gorgeous caparison of horses, mules, and camels was part of the Eastern magnificence. Men forget how, at the funerals of the rich, black horses are chosen and are clothed with black velvet.—Pusey.

"Let them turn." The prominence of the moral element in this repentance is very striking, and to this it was that God had respect, as we see in ver. 10. Compare it with the formal fasting and mourning of the Israelites (Isa. 58: 5–7; Zech. 7: 5–10).

"God repented of the evil. This was "a change, not in his unchangeable counsel, but in his act." "Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world, and with him there is no variableness or shadow of turning" (see also Num. 23: 19). Yet we find him presenting himself to human effort and prayer, "entreated of those who call upon him." When they repented, the position in which they stood towards God's righteousness was altered. So God's mode of dealing with them must alter accordingly if God is not to be inconsistent with himself. What was really a change in them and in God's corresponding dealings is, in condescension to human conceptions, represented as a change in God —Fairbairn.

"He did it not." Israel had now a practical proof that he was the God of the heathen also, and could prepare for himself a people even among them. Of what was he asign to the Ninevites? Of God's justice and God's mercy. The typical teaching of the book may be summed up in the words of St. Paul, "That Christ should suffer and that he should be the first that should rise from the dead, and should shew light unto the people (of Israel), and to the Gentiles."—Perowne.

OBITUARY.

E. S. LIVINGSTON died at his home in Reynoldsburg, Ohio, Sept. 7, 1885, aged 82 years, revered and esteemed for his Christian character and fidelity to principle in all the region about. He was a prominent member of the Presbyterian church and an earnest worker in the Sabbath school. His death was occasioned by a chill which came upon him while at church and whose effect was quickly fatal. Though his last change came suddenly he was found ready to go hence when it was God's will, and so he fell asleep in Jesus. His long and useful life of activity in the Master's work made him like a full ripe sheaf ready to be garnered. He was consistent in his Christian profession in that he earnestly embraced the cause of Christian reforms, no matter though unpopular with the world. He ardently hoped that he might live to see the triumph of the reforms against the lodge and intemperance, and by faith anticipated that glorious day. He loved the Cynosure and worked for its circulation, often remarking that he would sooner miss his dinner than a number of the paper. His physician encouraged him during his last sickness by urging that he must get well to continue his work in this reform and promising that he would himself distribute some tracts. The thought revived the aged Christian and for a time he seemed better. The laborers in this reform will miss his counsel and enthusiasm. May there be some man of faith and youth upon whom his mantle of consecration shall fall.

Total relief paid, $38,914,406.16.

—The Uniform Rank of the Knights of Pythias, the Knights Templar of that order, is instituting what they call a "sacred" day. It is reported that "General Brand will order soon the inauguration of an annual church parade, accompanied by religious services, to be held Nov. 8. All the divisions in and contiguous to the city will be ordered out to take part in the exercises, and it is intended to make the occasion a solemn and impressive one. The religious services will be held in the cathedral of SS. Peter and Paul, corner Washington boulevard and Peoria street, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon. The services will be conducted by the Very Rev. W. T. Whitmarsh, Dean of Carrollton, who is the Brigade Chaplain. He will deliver a sermon appropriate to the occasion, accompanied by the customary Episcopal services."

AMERICAN PLATFORM.

ADOPTED AT CHICAGO, JUNE 20, 1884.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled condition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clanuishness by which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile bands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruption, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; aud having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and believing the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, both inevitable and indispeusable:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, believing with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; believing in the Christian marriage, and not in Mormonism; believing in the religious democracy of the New Testameut, and not in the despotism of the lodge; believing, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, not in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we abhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscience by human laws and penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly believe that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike foes to human liberty and welfare. We further most firmly believe that a government without God has none but lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a merc usurpation, we regard all religions and worships invented by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as merc swindling impositions and cheats. We believe in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly believe that the bravery and blood of our soldiers have bought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will be just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised by the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon be not only echoed by their voices, but sustained by their votes.

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following, as containing a brief synopsis of the principles of our government, by which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.
2. That the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.
3. That God requires, and man needs a Sabbath.
4. We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.
5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.
6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to beuefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.
7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punishment of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.
8. We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage.
9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be preserved inviolate, and the same equality should be extended to Indians and Chinamen.
10. That international differences should be settled by arbitration.
11. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.
12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.
13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.
14. That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.
15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

The Christian Cynosure.

EDITORS.

J. BLANCHARD. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1885.

This number is given largely to the meeting of the American Missionary Association. Every word of it should be read. Its field is the South, and the key of the White House is in colored hands for the next four years; and this Missionary Association, Mr. Cable showed, to-day teaches the teachers of the colored population.

W. B. Stoddard has scarcely yet arrived in Ohio but he has sent already twenty-five subscribers to the Cynosure. Rev. Mr. Loggan has begun to obtain subscribers, and other agents are learning this necessary art and will soon be heard from. When the Cynosure has twenty thousand paying subscribers, no mission board, political party, or other organization, either can or will desire to resist the truth as opposed to the secret lodge system, which is the common enemy of mankind.

PRESIDENT HOPKINS of the American Board, in his late address to that august body, said: "The obstructions to the spread of the Gospel of Christ over this earth seem to be many, but are really but one, viz., something called religion. Emotion is considered religion. Men will groan and shout in their meetings, and steal chickens on their way home. Orthodoxy is made a religion. Men will stand by their creed, but will drive hard bargains and rent houses for liquor and infamous uses." Here Dr. Hopkins stopped. It is amazing that a man of his undoubted goodness and great capacity should be silent concerning the Satan worships, denounced by Moses in Deut. 32: 17, and by Paul in 1 Cor. 10: 20, 21, and which have covered and still cover this earth in Christian as well as heathen lands. This same great and good Dr. Hopkins, though cordially hating slavery, brothered with slaveholders and ridiculed the Free Soil party as "Free dirt."

PHILLIP, THE FATHER OF ALEXANDER THE GREAT, said he could take the strongest walled cities into which he could introduce a mule loaded with silver. Let us invade the South with money in our hands and love in our hearts. Peter Howe is a Baptist of the first water; and he can build Bro. Countee's house for him and not wince. Let that house be built. The Lord willing, the senior editor of the Cynosure will start for Memphis in a few weeks, and if the Masons have not Morganized Bro. Countee he will put your money into his hands.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

THE AMERICAN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

MADISON, Wis., Oct. 28, 1885.

This body met yesterday and is now in session. Dr. Thomas, of Brookline, Mass., preached a very able discourse from the potter and the clay, Jer. 18. The doctrine drawn from it was that God deals with men as nations, and they depart from his ways to "their own devices," God will break that nation in pieces and use it in some other way, for his own glory, though haply for baser ends. The doctor said: "The Puritans brought good clay from England and began well, a nation recognizing God's rights and man's; but marred their work with slavery and caste. God has broken our marred vessel, wiped out slavery, and is wiping out caste." The discourse was earnest and good, but "marred" by totally ignoring the cause that did the "marring," as given by the prophet in verse 15th, thus: "Because my people have forgotten me; they have burned incense to vanity, and they have caused them to stumble in their ways from the ancient paths, to walk in paths, in a way not cast up," etc. (Read the whole chapter.)

The thing that broke the Hebrew commonwealth was their system of false, man-invented worships, of which our secret, Christ-excluding lodge worships are an exact copy and continuation. And yet, though Harris of Jackson, Miss., and others, are here who can tell us of the late attempted murders in Memphis, and of the heart-wrung pastors of the colored churches in the South, who are crying out against the secret orders which are paying thousands on thousands in lodge dues and starving pastors' wives and children, the speaker seemed in perfect ignorance, both of the meaning of the text-chapter and the counterfeit religions of the South, with their sham altars, priests, high and grand high priests, rituals, liturgies, and promises of heaven to worshipers, dying sober or drunk! This dastardly state of things is not to last. The American Missionary Association has spoken out against the lodge. Their Secretary Roy has two speeches in print against it; and perhaps this meeting may yet find time and strength to blow a blast on the silver trump of God for Christ against these worships of Baal, which the old Hebrew prophets gave their lives to resist.

AMERICAN CASTE.

Rev. Dr. Ross, of Port Huron, Michigan, has just read a forcible, learned and Scriptural paper against caste which ought to be circulated by thousands North and South. It had two blemishes. Dr. Ross admitted that "Abraham held slaves, and the law of Moses tolerated slavery." Whereas, my venerated teacher, Dr. Lyman Beecher, exclaimed, "D'ye think Moses dragged the poor creturs" (slaves of surrounding nations). "D'ye think he got ropes on them and dragged them over the lines into the liberty of the sons of God! No. No. 'Twant slavery! It's a mockery to call it so!" I took Dr. Ross aside and giving hearty praise to his paper begged him not to allow that concession to appear in print, and he made the alteration.

The other defect was that in describing the kingdom of Christ, as making no discriminations against Greek or Jew, barbarian or Scythian, bond or free. The writer stopped short and omitted the words "male or female." I told Dr. Ross that I hoped he would put the women in, as Paul did, and leave us to say whether that means woman suffrage.

George W. Cable speaks here to-morrow night. I shall stay and hear him. I have seen Hon. S. D. Hastings. He is an active and able man, an officer in the church. I write this currente calamo, and will give as full an account as I can. The meeting is large and intensely interesting.

BETTER AND BETTER.

OCT. 29th.—I last night saw President Bascom of the Wiscousin University, and stated to him our desire for a general congress of churches opposed to the secret lodge system. His reply, condensed, was, "I am opposed to that whole thing. I hope you will have your convention." I took tea with the Presbyterian pastor, Rev. Mr. McAtee. George W. Cable is his guest. I remain to-night to hear him speak. Mr. Cable is not larger in stature than Dr. Watts or Alexander Pope, but much finer looking than either of those great-souled men. By his suggesting these men, you will see that I think Mr. Cable a Christian gentleman and a genius. Born and reared in New Orleans, he has not had the advantages of Wheaton College, but the secret lodge system has nothing to hope but much to fear from Mr. Cable. He has removed his family from New Orleans to Northampton, the intellectual metropolis of Massachusetts, as Worcester is its political and Boston its commercial center. In this he shows sound judgment and wide observation. The country is to hear from him. It does already. Rev. Mr. McAtee was, for a time, pastor of the Fifth Presbyterian church in Chicago. I did not converse at large with him on the subject; but he had seen the Cynosure and was loving and courteous to its editor. His church has built him a beautiful parsonage, and they have a clear-thinking pastor who believes the Bible and abhors a razeed Gospel, cut down and shaped to the taste of a world-ridden church and its Masonic creed.

THE AMERICAN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION

was originated by Abolitionists and is now sustained by their children. Its make-up is out of the earnest human material, and its field of labor—the Freedmen, Indians, Chinese and Southern mountaineers—is pre-eminently "the bottom of the grate" of American society. There is where the Gospel always kindles its fires to regenerate our race. Its members now see that the secret orders are ruining the Southern churches, and they are, perhaps, ignorant of the fact that the Indians and Chinese have their secret lodges as well as the negroes, whose secret oaths and their diabolical penalties are the greatest obstruction to bringing them to Christ. Their missionaries fight these snakes in their bosoms, of whose ways and even of whose existence they may be ignorant. No Indian chief sits down to have his long locks cut off in order to put on civilized clothing and take up manual labor without trembling in every limb as he remembers the secret oaths of his religion! and the Chicago dailies report the late murder of "the Chinese Morgan" in Portland, Oregon, for violating lodge oaths; and also the shooting of anti-secret ministers and people in Memphis, Tennessee, which the mass of godly men and women here met "do not know anything about," as many of them promptly tell us. Worst of all, Prof. Morris (colored) of Fisk University, Tenn., made us a fine speech last night on "the present state of the negro;" but after mentioning every other embarrassment he stopped short when he got to the secret lodges, which he knows are starving the colored pastors, and the wives and children of the blacks, while paying thousands on thousands to the men who run the secret lodges. Within a few stone's casts of Prof. Morris's home lives a keen, capable colored man who keeps up his "lodge dues" in five different orders, and his wife takes in washing to earn his bread. Now one word from Dr. Strieby or Dr. Roy or Secretary Powell would have led Prof. Morris to say, "And, brethren, I must say the darkest cloud in the horizon of the negro is the craze for secret societies, which is now spreading like a pestilence over all the South; and, besides the money loss and loss of time which it brings us, there is something in those secret lodges which sucks all the Christianity out of those who frequent them." We send this little speech to Prof. Morris, and I mistake if he does not put this or a better one into his next public performance.

But let us not be severe or uncharitable. Drs. Strieby, Roy and Powell are in the condition of Obadiah, who "feared the Lord greatly," and "fed his prophets by fifty in a cave," and thus helped Elijah to bring on the issue against Baal worship, and call down fire from heaven. The mistake was made at Mt. Vernon, Ohio, when the A. M. A. was beginning to plant churches. But the mistake has been made. Then was the time to have sealed their churches against Christ-excluding and Christ-rivaling lodges. Now the cure must come from a national convention of anti-secret churches.

"THE MOUNTAIN WORK."

There is here a woman from the Tennessee mountains, a Mrs. St. Clair, who is converting the half savage whites of the central mountain belt in the South, as Queen Bertha converted our German and French ancestors to Christianity at first. These "poor white trash," ground out by a slave-holding aristocracy into mountain peasants, with all the Southern haughtiness, retaining nothing of slavery but its hatred of the negro and love of whisky and tobacco—these poor whites have still the blood of the old cavaliers, who settled the South, in their veins; and when converted to Christ they will equal Cromwell's Iron-sides. This lady spoke to us at large. She is a fine-looking, fine-spoken woman; a born missionary. Her husband preceded the railroad to saw timber in those mountains, and this wife of his who pined for a foreign mission when a girl, found her mission field in those mountains; and by God's guidance and help diminished the distilleries simply by planting Sabbath-schools in her neighborhood from twenty-five to three. Among the converts there is "one of Morgan's thieves," who owned two saloons, an infidel and gambler. This man is now a deacon and Sabbath-school superintendent, and sent his greetings to the Association and his thanks for his conversion to Christ. Dr. Roy, in looking up this mountain population and their lady apostle, has done a noble work. But

"LO, THE POOR INDIAN!"

There are five of them, two young men and three girls, modest, witty, and even saintly in their faces. They sing hymns in the soft, sweet Dakota dialect and in English as well; and the speeches from young Riggs, an old graduate of mine, and the young, vehement Indian secretary from Connecticut, and others, have "fired all our hearts." And now since we are troubled to know what to do with our surplus national revenue, there wants but the national convention of anti-secret churches, followed by a "powerful" Methodist convention of this American Missionary Association and its sisters, the American Board and American Home Missionary Society, and these again followed by Joseph Cook's lecture delivered in Boston, and read from the Florida Gulf to Puget Sound, to place voters enough on the American party platform to make the United States a "Christian and not a heathen nation."

THE ASSOCIATION'S MISSION.

Secretary Tompkins led the prayer meeting Wednesday morning. He called on the Cynosure editor to lead in prayer, who complied and followed his prayer with the following remarks:

"Brethren, an old Greek philosopher was asked, What is the occupation of Jupiter? Neptune rules the sea; Terra the earth; Mars is busy with wars; but what does Jupiter do? The wise man answered: 'Jupiter busies himself in lifting up the lowly, and abasing the proud.'

"That, brethren, is the mission of this Association. In adjusting relations with the American Board and the American Home Missionary Society the crippled and the crushed races were given to the American Missionary Association. The cross-bearing African, the hated Mongolian, the Indians, the original proprietors of the soil, now ground down between our vices and our greed, now ready to bury the hatchet and take hold of the plow,—these oppressed races are the ones in which our Saviour takes the profoundest interest. Christ's parish was "the poor," and these are the parish of the American Missionary Association. And surely, it is sublime to be moving with Christ, to kindle the fire of God in the bottom of the human grate. When these fires were kindled in the slave-prisons where the negro lay, the flames soon burst out, and enveloped the whole continent in its blaze, and melted off the last fetter from the slave.

"Some one has said that society is like a kettle of water heating. The lowest layer of particles, next to the fire, expanded by the heat, are all the time ascending to the top, and the upper layer is cooling and sinking to the bottom. The founders of this Association were Abolitionists. Some of us are here to-day, with our whitened locks, and some of us with few locks to whiten. A brother on my left has taken us back twenty years to the time when the slave's shackles fell. Let us go back seventeen years farther. In 1848, in Tremont Temple, Boston, I moved before 2,000 people in the American board what you will find in the minutes of that year:—

"Resolved, That slave-holding is a practice which is not to be continued in the Christian church."

"This resolution was voted down! It was equivalent to declaring that slave-holding is to be continued in the Christian church. And the work in some of the mission schools was then being done by slaves; and the schools were teaching to young Indians a slave-holding religion. The American Home Missionary Society about that time increased its Slave-State churches twenty in a single year. At that time this Association was struggling into birth and being. We Abolitionists were the bottom layer in the kettle of society then; and as some of you know, it was exceedingly hot. At that time the American Board and the American Home Missionary Society represented the popular Christianity of the United States. They led the missionary hosts of other denominations; and we were called Free Missions, because these great bodies did not dare touch the Mendi Africans. Now behold the change! Why our king-bee, Secretary Strieby, whom this Association has so happily and harmoniously followed, was the other day elected a corporate member of that august American Board. So the bottom layer has already gotten to the top, so far as this body is concerned. Let us bring these crushed races up to the same summit level. But, brethren, let us not forget that to redeem mankind, and burn up its vices we must keep the lower layer hot, by the fire and hammer of reform.

PERSONAL PANORAMA OF THE MADISON MEETING.

Dea. Lamb, for his pastor, gave the address of welcome in behalf, he said, of not only Congregationalists, but Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists, and Roman Catholics, all of whom opened their houses to entertain the Association. His address was neat and pertinent. Awhile since Dea. Lamb's pastor, in a prayer meeting where secret orders were censured, took their part and said: "If the churches would not take care of their poor he respected secret societies for doing it." Mr. Lamb was excited. His remarks were not reported, but we hope they might have run thus:

"Brethren, this praising the lodge and disparaging the church, the Bride of Christ, is as if a man should allow a harlot in his house, and then reproach the good old mother who had borne and nourished his children, because she was not so much of a flirt as the mistress." The Presbyterian minister, McAtee, would not have made such a speech as that.

has been already noticed. He is taller than his slender make indicates. His lecture will not be printed, as it is to be repeated. The large church was packed below and above; chairs filled the aisles, and when the lecture closed the applause was loud and prolonged, and Mr. Cable rose repeatedly and acknowledged the applause. He is a singular compound of delicacy and strength. The drift of his discourse, backed by letters from all parts of the South, was that the American Missionary Association had done a noble work; that contracting it would be disastrous, and dropping it fatal to the welfare of the ex-slaves. His statistics of contribution to the work from the Southern churches, contrasted with what was given from the North, fully sustained the doctrine of the lecture. Genius is always radical, and Mr. Cable is a genius. The American lecture field will be advanced by him, as it is strengthened by Joseph Cook.

JAMES GARVIE

is a half-blood Indian whose father was killed in the Sioux outbreak. His mother then took him with her to the woods and he "ran wild" for ten years, when he was picked up and put in the schools. He is now a teacher in the Santee Normal Training School at the Santee Agency in Northern Nebraska. He goes East to speak to the churches in behalf of the Indians. His brief speech was manly and Christian. He said he was not accustomed to speak to audiences like this. But he wished to thank the American Missionary Association for what it has done and is doing for his race.

"The missionary last night said that the white man's heart might be blacker than the colored man's. I should like to know what color you heart really is. Is it not red? And surely the red man ought to have a share in it.

"A few of us held a meeting just before we left the agency to come down here. Some of them thought we could not meet again, and one who had lately believed in Christ wept, and we all wept with him. There was not a dry eye in the room. Now you may cut an Indian into inch-pieces without getting a tear. But the Holy Ghost can draw tears from an Indian." He plead that the schools might be enlarged, and the Indians protected from the vices of the low whites.

EX-GOV. WILLIAM B. WASHBURN

is president of the Association. He is "one of the Washburns," left by the early death of their father to the prayers of a mother and the promises of God. They have all been Governors, Congressmen, and Elihu B. would have been President of the United States, perhaps, but for a single letter in which he said of the "salary-grab:" "When we had eight dollars a day I laid up some money. When we were paid three thousand a year I laid up some more. But no amount of pay will comfortably support a member of Congress who keeps three or four fast women, and bucks the tiger every night."

The Cynosure editor met this Governor Washburn a few fears ago in the prayer meeting in the east wing of the Capitol. He was serving out the unexpired term of Senator Sumner.

The last night of the meeting, after Mr. Cable's speech, Mr. Washburn arose, and gave a calm, statesman-like, Christian speech. He began with a humorous account of his stay over Sabbath in the Palmer House, Chicago, where the head clerk did not know who the Congregationalists were, and could not direct him to the New England or Plymouth church, though the Congregational ministers held their weekly meeting in the parlors of that hotel. Christ and the apostles, or their successors, the Puritans, were not so fortunate in escaping public observation.

Mr. Washburn then endorsed the objects, and plead for the extinction of the debt of the Association. He said the interest of a church in the mission cause was graded by that of their pastor; though he lamented that only about one-third of a church were willing to give for good objects. It reminded him of an old lady, who doubted the story of Samson's foxes because her son John only caught three or four foxes in a winter. "Well," suggested her husband, "I believe two-thirds of them must have been skunks and woodchucks." If Gov. Washburn will examine closely he will probably find the "skuks and woodchucks" pay to the lodge.

Gov. Washburn, like all great-souled, Christian men, has no fellowship with secret societies, and never would join one; and but for the Aarons among the Congregational clergy, he would, like John Quincy Adams and Richard Rush, take an open stand against them. He can remember when the Andover faculty, Woods, Stuart, Emerson, etc., came out in a pamphlet against the lodge, and the churches of Massachusetts generally cast out the followers of strange worships from their communion. He knows when the huge "Temple" on Boylston street, Boston, built by the money of the Masonic masses, was sold to the United States for a round sum and the money went to the pockets of the few who made Masonry their trade. The Cynosure begs this statesman, gentleman, American and Christian to turn his thoughts on this grave, national, fundamental theme. He will doubtless find even in his Puritan town of Greenfield, that many times more money goes to the lodge, and its children, than to the church of the Living God, "the pillar and ground of the truth;" and since God has given him the hearts of the people, especially the churches of Massachusetts, they would hear and would be glad to know the reasons why he has kept out of the dark lodges. Will he not see and say that the lodge has come back into power from the public abhorence which crushed it, without answering an objection or an argument? and that the dykes which the churches threw around them when he was young are now swept away, and the inky dragon's flood is driving God and goodness from those churches? If men like the Washburns, the very embodiment of American principles, will stand in silence and see the oath lose its sanctity, and the court house sink into popular contempt, and God turn away his face because Christ's worship is allied to and mingled with the devil's; then indeed the wrath of God, which has sunk the dead nations must fall on us, and our beloved Republic follow the fate of the once glorious Hebrew commonwealth.

THE WISCONSIN STATE MEETING:—As no further communication has been received from the officers of the Wisconsin Association, we suppose the original notice is yet good, and repeat: The annual meeting of the Wisconsin State Christian Association will be held in Waukesha, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, Nov. 17 to 19th. Bro. Bancroft is laboring in the vicinity, preparing the way, and Pres. C. A. Blanchard is engaged among the speakers.

—The N. C. A. Treasurer reported nearly $30 in his hands for Bro. Edward Mathews, including the canceling of the account with the N. C. A. Board. The Free Methodist reports nearly $70 sent in, $25 of which was from Father Catterlin, of Abilene, Kansas, instead of $5.00, as incorrectly reported by us last week.

—The case of lodge murder among the Chinese lodges, in Oregon, receives a little further explanation from an item in the Philadelphia Ledger, which says: "A Chinese Morgan case, now on trial at Portland, Or., is attracting considerable attention. Mah Yim is being tried for murder, and his council claims that he is innocent, and is being put forward as a scapegoat for the real malefactor, a prominent Chinese Mason, who committed the deed in vengeance upon the victim who had divulged secrets of the order. The killing was done during a session of the lodge, and the members are all trying to secure Mah Yim's conviction."

—Our thanks are due Mr. G. Sisson, of East Boldon, Newcastle-on-Tyne, England, a reader of the Cynosure, for a copy of the Sentinel, a monthly organ of the Social Purity movement in England, and an extra of the London Christian, on the same topic.

—Bro. Dissette and Secretary Stoddard addressed a meeting in the chapel of Pro-Seminary, Elmhurst, Ill., Saturday evening last. As a storm of rain and snow was driving without, the audience was mainly composed of the faculty and students of the institution. The latter are an earnest, enquiring class of young men, who are awake to the evil influence of the lodge.

—Our readers will greet eagerly the letter of Bro. Robert Shemeld, who went last year with his wife as an independent missionary to Africa. The other members of the company were brethren W. W. Kelley and Harry Agnew, one a Free Methodist preacher, the other a member of the Salvation Army in St. Paul. Their purpose was to penetrate toward the interior of Africa from the east coast by the river Zambesi and the great inland lakes. Political changes in eastern Africa altered their plan, and Bro. Shemeld is now laboring among the Zulus in the province of Natal, while the others are located farther to the north, in Umzilla's kingdom, and are addressed at Inhambane.

—The "Masonic Refreshment Bar" referred to by Bro. Shemeld, advertises itself with a square and compass thus:

"At last a long felt want is now supplied. The 'Masonic Refreshment Bar' is now under new management, where you can get ham sandwiches, bread and butter and cheese, Anchovy sandwiches, boiled eggs and Bengal oysters every morning. Oysters, mussels and pawns in season. Biscuit and cheese always on the counter at your disposal, free. Only the best wines and spirits. Only the finest draught ale and stout. Only the choicest cigars kept at the 'Masonic Luncheon and Refreshment Bar.'"

We commend this feature of Masonic temperance to the the prohibition press.

—The American Humane Association will meet on Wednesday, Nov. 19th, in St. Louis, and will continue three days. Among the interesting topics to be discussed are "Humane Education," "Transportation of Stock," "Humane Methods of Killing," "Education of Lower Animals," "The Over-check rein," "Prosecution of Offenders," "Co-operation of Police." The useful and necessary work of this society demands the co-operation of every reasonable man and woman. It is to be hoped that large delegations will attend at St. Louis.

The Home.

TEACH ME TO LIVE.

Teach me to live! 'Tis easier far to die—
Gently and silently to pass away—
On earth's long night to close the heavy eye,
And waken in the realms of glorious day.

Teach me that harder lesson—how to live,
To serve thee in the darkest paths of life,
Arm me for the conflict now—fresh vigor give,
And make me more than conqueror in the strife

Teach me to live!—thy purpose to fulfil;
Bright for thy glory let my taper shine!
Each day renew, re-mould this stubborn will:
Closer round thee my heart's affections twine.

Teach me to live for self and sin no more;
But use the time remaing to me yet,
Not mine own pleasure seeking, as before—
Wasting no precious hours in vain regret

Teach me to live! No idler let me be,
But in thy service hand and heart employ;
Prepared to do thy bidding cheerfully—
Be this my highest and my holiest joy.

Teach me to live!—my daily cross to bear;
Nor murmur though I bend beneath its load.
Only be with me. Let me feel thee near;
Thy smile sheds gladness on the darkest road.

Teach me to live! And find my life in thee—
Looking from earth and earthly things away;
Let me not falter, but untiringly
Press on and gain new strength and power each day.

Teach me to live!—with kindly words for all—
Wearing no cold, repulsive brow of gloom;
Waiting with cheerful patience, till thy call
Summons my spirit to her heavenly home.

A WORD WITH WORKING WOMEN.

There are no persons more economical or more wasteful than women. The most valuable possession that a woman has, is time, and this is frequently most sadly wasted. Says Elizabeth Cummings: "I am convinced that at least one quarter of the work performed by women is unnecessary, and that the world would get on quite as well without it. It is like the ottoman cover I once saw a lady working. She was all bent up and putting her eyes out counting stitches. 'I don't get any time for reading,' she said plaintively, as she picked up some beads on a needle. 'You must have a great deal of leisure.' But yet she had spent more time embroidering a ridiculous dog on a piece of broadcloth, than would have sufficed to read twenty good books. It did not have the poor merit of being economical, for the price of the material would have bought enough handsome damask for two covers. The meanest work that makes home a lovely, sacred place, is consecrated, and fit for the hands of a queen: but delicate work that ministers to no human need, even if it has artistic merit to recommend it, if it consumes the hours a woman ought to use in training her mind to think, and her eyes to see, is busy idleness and a waste of time. I hope the day will come when every woman who can read will be ashamed of the "Columns for the Ladies" printed in some of our papers, which tell with more sarcastic emphasis than any words of mine how some women choose to spend their leisure. Surely if they have time to follow intricate directions for making all sorts of trimming, not so good as that sold in the shops for two cents a yard, they may, if they will, find a few moments in which to read a book."

It is a pitiful sight to see women squandering their precious time on miserable trumpery, and wasting their lives on needless and worse than useless frivolities. And this same wastefulness is visible in various departments of household life. Women who cannot find time to read the Word of God, will pore over a library of well-thumbed cook-books and occupy whole hours in compounding and cooking indescribable mixtures of fanciful and unhealthful food, killing themselves cooking what other people kill themselves by eating.

Trouble came into this world by a woman's tempting a man to eat; and the practice has been pretty thoroughly kept up. Men supplied with plain, wholesome food are quite sure to eat all that is for their good, and more, without urging; but if in addition to the force of their natural appetite, the women devote their energy and skill to compounding and preparing tempting articles of food, and then coaxing them to eat them, they are quite likely to yield to the snares that are spread before them and become gluttonous and dyspeptic. All such useless work occupies the time, exhausts the strength and wastes the energies that might be devoted to the good of humanity and the glory of God. An old lady once said to the writer, that when she was young she could cook for a family of a dozen as easily as she could for a family of three now, when there were so many different dishes to be prepared. Gluttony is one of the sins of the age, and while multitudes are pining for daily bread, Christian people are contriving to see how much money they can spend, how much material they can use, how much time they can waste in tempting persons to eat what they do not need, and in stimulating the jaded appetites, which need nothing so much as plain living, fasting, and prayer. And as a result of their luxury they derange their digestive organs and ruin their health, so that probably ten persons die of over-eating where one dies for want of food. The poor also ape these miserable fashions, and the means which would supply them abundantly with wholesome food are squandered on nicknacks and ill-cooked luxuries until means are exhausted and destitution stares them in the face.

Our Lord Jesus warns his people against "surfeiting," or over-eating; saying, "Take heed to yourselves lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares." Luke 21: 34. The days before the flood were days of gluttony and intemperance. They ate, they drank, they bought, they sold, "and knew not until the flood came and took them all away." At the foundation of the sins of Sodom lay luxury, "pride, fullness of bread and abundance of idleness." Ezek. 16: 49. And in the gluttonous habits of the present day may be found the root of the temptations to sensuality and sin which overcome so many.

Women are almost universally overworked, but if they would omit the useless work they do, the rest could be performed with a reasonable expenditure of strength. But all the appliances and conveniences of modern life fail to give woman the rest she desires. Much of the work done by woman's hands in the days gone by is now done by machinery. The spinning-wheel and the hand-loom have given place to the powerful machinery of the factories, and the sewing machine has relieved the weary needle-woman of much of her work; but though a sewing machine will take twenty stitches while a woman can take one, it sometimes happens that they put twenty times as many stitches into their clothing as they did before, and so gain nothing by the improvement. Thank God there are some whose hearts are devoted to higher things, who follow the example of Dorcas of old,—the only woman who was brought back from the grave, and whose life was lengthened out to bless the church and the world; and who will not waste their energies upon trifling things while humanity suffers and souls are perishing around them. May their tribe increase.—The Common People.

A WORD WITH WORKING MEN.

The thinking man who has noticed the two late meetings of the labor societies in Chicago must necessarily be impressed with the fact of such gatherings, and will be unable to pass them by without serious reflection. We will neglect the communist gathering at present, for there is no possible discussion with them. But for the sober, honest, industrious men who marched out to Ogden's Grove, passed vague resolutions, consumed some beer, and had a good time generally, a few words may be of interest. To begin with, these men should elevate their condition if they can. They should earn all they can, and live as well as their means will permit. But, with human nature as now constituted, there is no one to help them but themselves, and the only practical remedy lies in their own hands. It is not in the province of governments to make any man rich or poor. All any government can or ought to do is to open the race-course and keep it open, provide rules for fair play, see that they are enforced, and then keep its hands off. That the strong, the cunning, and the well-educated, will in this race surpass the weak, the simple and the ignorant, goes without saying. It always has been so, and it always will be. The sober and industrious, other things being equal, will always succeed. The drunken and the idle will invariably fail, and no legislation can alter these ancient truisms. "But," says a mechanic, "I am not a drunkard; I am not lazy; I work hard, but my pay is small and my family large; I cannot earn barely more than a subsistence, and, if taken ill, my family suffer. I cannot get ahead even if well and steady at work." This is unfortunately the case with a great number of the laboring people. If such an one had had the sagacity when young to avoid an overworked trade, to keep out of a crowded city where every avenue is choked up, and to seek some place where he could get a piece of land, to avoid an early and imprudent marriage, to study his chosen vocation scientifically, and to seek to raise himself above the common level, he would have been differently placed. Unfortunately, this programme requires intelligence, labor, economy and self-control, and just here is where the pinch comes. At least nineteen out of the average of mankind do not possess these qualities in a sufficient degree to overcome the every-day temptations which beset us all. Young men will not study and work, labor and save, and those who do not will certainly be poor, unless rich by inheritance or luck, and most of these latter persons will easily lose the money that comes to them easily. No processions, no meetings, no resolutions, no legislation, can uproot these fundamental principles which underlie human nature. And if by any law the money of the rich could be taken from them and divided up, in ten years a new class of plutocrats would arise. And if the leveling process could be kept up long enough all riches would disappear, and the poor would be the first and worst sufferers.

The incentive to the acquirement of riches is human selfishness. Men work for themselves and their families. Take from them the assurance that they will enjoy the fruits of their labor, and no one will work, and anarchy sets in under the law of the survival of the fittest. The majority of mankind will never gain more than daily bread, and but few of the minority will ever be really rich. An ordinary mechanic, with a large family, in a city, has absolutely no chance to improve his condition unless he can contrive to quit the hopeless struggle. If he has boys able to work, and marriageable daughters, let him leave the city if he has to walk. In this new and rich country the best hope for the poor man is to become a land owner. It will be hard and dull work. There are no city pleasures or excitement out on the prairies. Everybody will have to work and save, but the end is absolutely certain to be a comparatively independent position for the second generation at any rate. After the free land is all taken up in America, then we shall have to face the problem which agitates Europe, and that time is not far off. In the meantime some little amelioration of certain things may be had. The convicts, instead of working at honest men's trades, should be set to work making roads in Illinois, of which we are in sad need. This would relieve one complaint, though a mere drop in the bucket. Co-operation will, under some circumstances, succeed, though many such enterprises have failed. And here, as elsewhere, the cunning and dishonest manage somehow to get the advantage.

Technical education will enable the studious and intelligent to do a kind of work that pays well, but the idle and dull will not or cannot avail themselves of its opportunities. Universal education will naturally tend to help the people, and yet such a smattering of learning as makes a man too proud for handicraft, and yet inefficient in brain labor, is often a curse rather than a blessing.

Shall we laboring men then sit down to endure our impoverished condition; live miserably, die poorly? By no means. In this new and rich country no healthy man of good ability and average sense ought to fail of a sufficient and decent livelihood. If he is in a business too crowded or uncertain, or overdone, get out of it. No matter what the sacrifice, make a change, and your family will reap the benefit if you do not. But do not waste your time striking, or organizing unions for such a purpose. Count the hundreds of failures of strikes to the one successful. Fit yourself for some other vocation, and in this country there are plenty of openings for able hands. If too old to make the change, then submit to the inevitable, but strive to give your children an environment more favorable than your own. Remember, above all, no one will help you but yourself.—The Building Budget.

THE CHAIN-GANG.

Uncle Fred sat in his easy chair with all the children about him; Dot on his knee, Belle and Harry on the arms of the chair, and even tall Walter sprawling on the rug before the fire. Such wonderful tales as he was telling them of the long voyage that had bronzed his face like an Indian's, and of the strange lands that he had seen in his travels!

They were talking of California, and the children were trying to fancy how it would seem to eat strawberries in December, or gather from the fields great sheaves of Easter lilies taller than Dot.

"I mean to go there when I am a man," said Harry; "that's the county to live in, where you can raise such fruit and flowers the year round."

"What was the best thing you ever saw, Uncle Fred?" asked Bell.

"How can he tell?" said Walter. "If a man was half starved the best thing he could see would be a good dinner, and if he was tired to death I suppose he would rather see a shanty, where he could rest, than the Yosemite Valley."

"There is a good deal of truth in that, Walter," said Uncle Fred, "but I think I can tell you what was the worst thing I saw—at least the thing that made me feel saddest. It was the chain-gang."

None of the younger children knew what a chain-gang might be, and Dot's blue eyes were full of horror as Uncle Fred told of the gang of men and boys, chained two and two, that toiled day after day upon the streets near his hotel—never unchained for a moment, at work or at rest, to eat or sleep, and several of them with a heavy ball attached to a chain dragging at their ankles.

"I don't know as I pity them much," said Walter; "they brought it on themselves, breaking the laws."

"Yes, and that is one of the worst things about it; they might as well have been free men, living by honest work, and they themselves chose to do what made them worse than slaves. There was one boy, only eighteen years old, who had spent nearly half his life in prison. It seems a strange choice to make."

"I suppose," said Harry, "they don't think about that part of it. They expect to steal and do bad things and not get caught."

"Oh! no; they don't expect to get caught. It would be odd enough if a boy should spend his time making a ball and chain, and fastening it upon himself, just for the sake of belonging to the chain-gang."

"Nobody would do that." said Harry.

"You may think so," said Uncle Fred, "but boys have been known to do that very thing; in fact, I have often seen it done."

"Fasten chains onto their feet!" exclaimed Bell in astonishment.

"Yes," said Uncle Fred. "It was done in this city last year; it has been done about every year since I can remember. There is more than one man in this city dragging about a ball and chain that he took the greatest pains to fasten upon himself when he was a boy."

Dot and Harry looked at Uncle Fred to see if he were perfectly sober, but Walter turned uneasily on the rug and muttered: "Pooh! I knew Uncle Fred would get in a sermon."

"Some of them spent the money that would have bought books and clothes in buying stuff to make the chains of. When they put it on it hurt badly and made them sick, but they persevered till they learned to walk and drag the heavy ball just as the rest of the chain-gang did. I dare say some of them would be very glad now to get rid of it, but when it is once fastened on it is no easy matter to cut it off."

"What foolish boys!" said Dot, shaking her head.

"There goes one now," said Uncle Fred, and the children rushed to the window; but instead of a man dragging an iron ball along the sidewalk they only saw Tom Canby in his new winter suit, with a long cigar in his mouth.

"I don't see any chain," began Dot, but Belle exclaimed with great disapproval:

"Why, Tom Canby is smoking!"

"Most all the fellows smoke," said Walter.

"Then," said Uncle Fred, "most of the fellows are spending their time and money in trying to fasten upon themselves a ball and chain that they will have to drag after them all their lives. Every bad habit and every foolish habit is a weight to hinder us. Good habits are wings to help us on, bad habits are fetters to hold us back. Which are you going to have for your journey?"

"I'll have wings," said Belle; but Walter said:"

"There's no harm in smoking."

"Is there any good in it, my boy? Suppose we agree that it will not hurt you; do you think it is good policy to fasten upon yourself a habit which is expensive to your pocket, disageeable to the majority of your friends, and of no possible use to you?"

Walter drew up his long legs and rested his chin on his knees, but did not answer.

"Let's be honest, Walter. Suppose it was something besides cigars—say onions, raw onions—and a set of fellows had started the fashion of carrying them around in their pockets, and eating, say, three or four a day; until their clothes and their hair and breath were so scented that they carried the odor everywhere, and fairly filled the streets and the depots and the cars with it."

"Faugh," said Belle, with a shiver of disgust.

"And then to make the case somewhat more a parallel, suppose that only gentlemen ate them, so that all ladies must endure the perfume, and that the onions cost from five to twenty-five cents apiece, and made you deathly sick when you first began to use them—what would you call a boy, who, against the wishes of his best friends, was trying to acquire the habit of eating them?"

"A fool!" said Walter emphatically.

"So I say, and if we put it just on that ground, and say nothing about the mischief the habit is sure to do him, it seems to me a sensible boy needs no other arguement. And so I say again, every bad habit and every foolish habit is a ball and chain to keep us from runuing and climbing. Good habits are like wings to help us to mount up; and when a boy has a chance to choose he must be very short-sighted to spend his time in fastening a chain upon his own feet. I might say a good deal more about it. I might tell you that the ball, even though it is very small at first, grows heavier every year, and that it is pretty sure to pick up something else as it is dragged about; but I'm sure none of you have any ambition to join the chain-gang."

"I choose wings," said Belle again, and Walter nodded to Uncle Fred and added:

"At least I'll not have that ball and chain." The children did not quite understand, but Uncle Fred and Walter did.—Emily Huntington Miller, in Congregationlist.

THE KETTLE'S SONG.

The kettle sang a merry song,
And timed it with its lid:
"Men say that liquor makes them strong;
It never, never did."

"The steamer ploughs the ocean wide,
What moves the wheel and beam?
She steams against the wind and tide,
And water makes the steam.

"You see the locomotive draw
The crowded train of cars,
With heated water, nothing more,
To pull them o'er the bars.

"The mill, the engine, boat and man,
And beast, (except the sot)
Derive their strength and motive power
From water, cold or hot.

"Then if you would be well and strong,
Drink only from the stream,
And work for right with prayer and song,
And 'use a little steam.'"

—From "Stories and Sketches."

FISHING FOR WATER.

"Did you ever hear of a place where the people are compelled to fish in the ocean for all the fresh water they use?" asked Ben Gormley, a sailor who has cruised in every water on the face of the globe. "There is such a place and I've been there. It's the hottest place I was ever in, and I've been to all the hot ones. Rain never falls there and the atmosphere never changes. I think it stands 120 degrees all the year round. Your thirsty when you go to sleep, you wake up in the night thirsty, you're thirsty all the day. Yet the people that live there appear to think they are in the garden spot of creation. That's natural, though, for it isn't likely one out of a hundred of them was ever in auy other place. This delightful spot is on the Persian Gulf, at Babrin, where they fish for the water they drink. I had the pleasure of staying there three days, ten years ago.

"I don't know who discovered the fact, but there are numberless springs of ice-cold water at the bottom of the Gulf, near the shore, where the water is about sixty feet deep. This must have beeu known when they first set up the town, of course, or it wouldn't have been started there. This fresh water gets to be salt enough, though, before it gets far from the bottom, and so they have to send down after it. When a man's wife calls him to go after a pail of water, he grabs a goatskin bag, calls the first neighbor he sees stretched out in the sand, and the two jump into a boat and row out a short distance. The man who is after the water wraps the goatskin about his left arm, with the mouth of the bag in his hand. Then he takes in his other hand a heavy stone. This stone is tied securely to the end of a long and strong line, for stones are valuable property there. Without them no one could go out and fetch a pail of water, and they are very scarce. With the stone firmly clutched in his hand the man dives into the water, and down he goes to the bottom. When he reaches the cool, fresh water gushing up from the sand, he opens the mouth of his goatskin bag, drops the stone, and floats upward in the strong current. The bag quickly fills and the mouth is closed again. When the man reaches the surface his companion lifts the bag into the boat and the diver follows. The stone is then carefully drawn up and the men go home.

"The water is cold and refreshing when it first comes up from the depths of the sea, but it soon gets flat and warm. The more you drink of it the thirstier you get, but the natives can get along on a few swallows of it now and then. The requirements of the climate keep the divers at work in the submarine springs for all they are worth, and the shore is lined with their boats all day long. The springs are said to be the outlet of large natural aqueducts in a range of mountains more than 500 miles from the coast, but I guess they would have a hard time to prove the theory if they were called upon to do it."—New York Sun.

TEMPERANCE.

THE WORK OF RUM.

Milwaukee, Wis., Sept. 3.—The attention of Judge Mann, of the Probate Court, was this afternoon given to an examination into J. P. C. Cottrill's mental condition, his brother, C. M. Cottrill, having made application for the appintment of a guardian. A number of wituesses were examined, and the opinion of medical experts was taken to show that Mr. Cottrill was a victim of alcoholism. Painful as is this sad termination of a career which once seemed destined to be one of the most brilliant, it is not entirely unexpected to the legal fraternity of the Northwest, among the members of which Mr. Cottrill has been known for years. It was not long ago that the gentleman ranked among the foremost in ability, and his colleagues have noted with sorrow his rapid decline of mind and body during the last few years. His memory is fast failing him, it being quite impossible for him to recall the most important events of very recent occurrence. Physically, he has also experienced a most alarming decline within the last six months.

Williamsport, Pa., Oct. 9.—"I have wasted my life and don't want to live any longer" was the contents of a note lying by the side of the dead body of Mrs. Annie Johnson, who had comitted suicide by taking opium, in an old shanty, yesterday afternoon. It was the last act in a truly wasted life. Twenty years ago she was Annie Johnson, the daughter of the oldest and best family in Pennsylvania and the acknowledged belle of Wilkesbarre. She was sought by all and her accomplishments were many and pleasing. She married Clarence Clark, a successful young business man. They lived in good style for awhile, until the husband commenced drinking and neglected his business. The wife, following in his lead, was soon a victim to the opium habit. Their friends tried to reclaim them in vain, and deserted them. The couple went to Bellenfonte and continued drinking and lived in au old house. At last, driven to dispair, he committed suicide. His wife was still devoted to him, and by selling a diamond ring, which she had managed to keep during their troubles, she gave him a decent burial. She drank worse than before after his death, and no one knew how she obtained money on which to live, but it is thought it was furnished by relatives. Her death yesterday was not a surprise to those who kuew her.

PROHIBITION VICTORY.

Judge Wagstaff, in the Wyandotte district, Kansas, lately rendered a decision in the case of Chas. Hohn, restrained by an injunction from selling liquors in his saloon at Kansas City, Kans., holding the injunction process is good and the prohibitory law is constitutional. This was made a test case by the saloon keepers and was ably argued with great confidence of success. The case will be carried to the Supreme Court. The Prohibitionists claim this a great victory.—Ex.

The school teachers of new Jersey are making an organized effort to exterminate the practice of cigarette smoking in schools, a perincious habit which has grown to an alarming extent. The superintendent of the schools iu Newark says there is scarcely oue boy in twelve of those who have reached their teens who does not smoke. That the use of the impure cigarettes which are sold to lads is productive of lung and throat discases is well knowu. Fortunately New Jersey has a law under which both sellers and consumers of the poison can be effeetually dealt with.

An entire block of buildings, including Hamilton's Opera House, at North Manchester, Ind., were destroyed by fire Monday night, causing a loss of $40,000, with but $10,000 insurance. The upsetting of a lamp by drunken men started the flames.

LITERATURE.

BETWEEN TWO OPINIONS.—The first edition of this new book is now ready. We need say nothing of the work itself. It has been before the readers of the Cynosure during the past year; shorn somewhat of its interest to be sure because of its appearing in brief weekly portions, but to the careful and critical reader showing a capability in the talented author to deal with great power and fidelity with the most difficult questions of our reform. It now appears in a beautiful volume, surpassing all others of its kind in fine, clear typography and neat binding. It should be on every Anti-mason's center-table. Before the book had left the bindery orders began to come in. Mrs. M. W. Bingham of Mallet Creek, Ohio, has the merit of purchasing the first volume. Mr. J. A. Conant of Connecticut orders fourteen copies. Let the whole edition be called for before the holidays. As this is the first bound volume issued by the N. C. A., it will be a pleasant souvenir of our publishing house.

THE WORKS OF JOHN RUSKIN: A Joy Forever—Munera Pulveris—Two Paths—Unto ThisLast—Storm Cloud of the 19th Century. Price, postpaid, $1.80. John B. Alden, New York.

This handsome volume, the second of the series of Ruskin's work now issuing by Mr. Alden, comprises five separate works, and under their enigmatical titles we have as many treatises upon some of the gravest questions in social and economical life. These treat successively upon the political economy of art, the elements of political economy, on art, decoration and manufacture,and the first principles of political economy. The first of these treatises, "A Joy Forever," consists of two lectures on the discovery, application, accumulation and distribution of art, with "Munera Pulveris," which may be translated "The Gifts of the Dust," and may be considered a synonym for wealth. Ruskin uses the secondary title, "Essays on the Elements of Political Economy." The author valued this work highly. Of it he says: "These pages contain, I believe, the first accurate analysis of the laws of Political Economy which has been published in England. Many treatises, within their scope correct, have appeared in contradiction of the views popularly received; but no exhaustive examination of the subject was possible to any person unacquainted with the value of the products of the higher industries, commonly called the 'Fine Arts:' and no one acquainted with the nature of those industries, has, so far as I know (1863), attempted or approached the task."

This work and "Unto This Last," were received by the British public with reprobation. The former began publication in Fraser's Magazine, the latter in Cornhill Magazine. The editors of both were obliged to discontinue because of the tumult, much as Theodore Tilton, then editor of the Independent, was forced to stop the Anti-masonic letters of President Finney. In either case the outcry was proof that the nail was hit on the head.

The November North American Review is a strong number. Emilio Castelar, the learned and eloquent Spanish patriot, whose voice was first during the brief days of the Republic which succeeded the corrupt Bourbon dynasty, writes on the "Progress of Democracy in Europe." Eugene Schuyler, whose investigations of the Turkish atrocities in Bulgaria aroused Christendom and gave Russia a pretext for the late war with the Porte, contributes an account of the treaty-making process which preceded the settlement of San Stephano which the meddlesome ambition of Lord Beaconsfield in the Berlin Congress marred with such measures as have now borne fruit in the present attempt at revolution in Bulgaria. "Slang in America," by Walt Whitman, is a popular account of some parts of the growth of our language. Admiral Ammen concludes his "Recollections and Letters of General Grant," and Hon. E. B. Washburne his interesting historical account of "Abraham Lincoln in Illinois." "Style and the Monument" is a keenly satirical critique upon our American style in architecture and decoration, and urges the round Roman tomb as the model for a great Grant monument. "Statecraft and Priestcraft," by Dr Philip Schaaf, "Race Prejudice" by Gail Hamilton, and a symposium on the demonetization of silver, complete the number.

The Missionary Review opens its current number with an instructive review of Prof. Fairbairn's lectures at Andover Theological Seminary on "Comparative Religions," followed by an account of the International Missionary Union held this year at Niagara Falls. The evangelization of the world and the plans for bringing the churches to a realization of the primary importance of this work are again discussed, and the suggestions of Dr. Pierson of Philadelphia are also confirmed and supplemented by by other Christian workers. The mission reports are of part of the Independent Foreign Missions, which numbered seventeen in 1884, with $113,280 collections and 400 workers, including women and native helpers. The interesting resume of European missionary societies is continued, also of the Women's Boards. Independent, fearless, just and earnestly Christian, the Missionary Review is a power in the cause of the world's evangelization not to be despised. Published at Princeton, N. J.

THE CHURCHES.

—Rev. Joseph Travis, editor of the Free Methodist and chairman of the N. C. A. Board, is absent in Kansas on a preaching tour.

—Rev. C. W. Hiatt of the High Street church, Columbus, O., received fourteen persons on profession of faith at the first communion service after his recent ordination.

—The mission work begun by brethren Loveless, Walker, Shaw, and others in the N. C. A. building is succeeding beyond all expectation. Nineteen meetings had been held up to last Thursday and over sixty conversions from all classes, and nearly all adults, are reported.

—Miss Gertrude Cunningham, of Centralia, Ill., and a Chicago lady, who within a few days went South as missionaries to labor among the blacks, stopped at Birmingham, Ala., but would not be received into any boarding-house as soon as their mission became known, a Baptist clergyman—one of their own denomination—even refusing to admit them into his household. They were told that, their work being among the negroes, they should confine their associations solely to that race.

—At Philadelphia last week there was a meeting of the General Board of Managers of the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal church. Mrs. Rutherford B. Hayes persided at the meeting. The subjects considered were: "Work Among theIlliterate Whites," "The Savannah Work." and the "Work in the South," etc.

—Rev. A. W. Hall, of College Springs, Iowa, when he engaged as general missionary agent for the Wesleyan churches, his pastoral work was taken up by Prof. A. R. Dodd. The church has lately been repaired and remodeled.

—The annual meetings of the three national missionary organizations of the Disciple church—the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, and the General Christian Missionary Convention—were held in Cleveland, Ohio, Oct. 20–23, at the Franklin Avenue Christian church. There were representatives from twenty-four States, the District of Columbia, and Ontario, Canada. They came from as far east as Massachusetts, as far north as Canada, as far south as Florida, and as far west as California, numbering in all about 500.

—Bro. A. J. Bell, the evangelist, has been continually employed since his visit to Wheaton early last Jannary. His last meeting at Manchester, Iowa, closed last week amid the rejoicing of some 300 converts of all ages. The meeting was held for thirty-five nights continuously—and no night without a conversion—in the skating rink, which held 1,200 persons, yet the congregation sometimes overflowed into the adjacent church. Among the rejoicing ones is the daughter of the Rev. B. M. Amsden, an aged Congregational minister, whose name was formerly often in the Cynosure, and who yet takes the warmest interest in religious work.

—The last Berea Evangelist contains the report of the annual meeting of the State Association of Christian Ministers and Churches of Kentucky which met at Berea, Oct. 9th, and, after the opening sermon disbanded and dissolved. The members of the defunct organization continued their meeting as a convention of Christians simply. The reasons for this dissolution are not given by the Evangelist, but may be inferred from a letter of Rev. John G. Fee to the Cynosure last year, wherein he mentioned that the affiliation of one of the churches connected with the Association with the Masonic lodge would make either the discipline of that Louisville church necessary or compel a dissolution.

—The daughters of President Bascom, of Wisconsin University; of Dr. Cyrus Hamlin, late President of Middlebury College, Vermont, and of Dr. Lyman Abbott, editor of the Christian Union, have all gone this fall to the Hampton (Va.) school to teach the colored people and Indians.

—The Christian people of Cincinnati, represented by the members of the Noon-day Prayer Meeting Committee of that city, send forth to the Christian world, a request for their prayers for Cincinnati, its ministers and people. Several evangelists will occupy the field and supplement the work of the pastors during the coming fall and winter. Let every child of God breathe a prayer to heaven for divine favor upon this city and its special work.

—The church at DeKalb, Ill., laid the corner-stone of a new house of worship Oct. 22, the ceremony being performed by I. K. Ellwood, Esq., in the presence of a large company. An original hymn by the pastor, Rev. J. P. Hutchinson, was sung, and the poet Whittier sent Mr. Hutchinson a beautiful letter expressive of his good wishes. The church will be stone and when completed will be the finest building in the city.

—The week beginning Sunday November 8, will be observed throughout the civilized world as a season of prayer for young men, and Young Men's Christian Associations. This season had its origin in a resolution adopted by the International Convention of the American Associations held in Albany, N. Y., in 1866, and has been observed every year since at the recommendations of the subsequent conventions. There are now 2,900 of these associations in the world.

Mr. Moody will conduct services at Dartmouth, N. H., November 3rd and 4th.

—The Rev. Griffith John, of the London Missionary Society in China, has completed his translation of the New Testament into Wehli, and the Bible Society of Scotland desires him to make a similar translation of the Psalms.

PERSECUTIONS IN CHINA.

A report has been received by the Secretary of State at Washington, from Consul Charles Seymour, at Canton, China, inclosing pamphlets issued by the Shanghai and Hankow committees describing the persecution of Christians in China. Mr. Seymour says the material in the pamphlet is from the pens of eminent American, English, and German missionaries, and is published with the purpose of disseminating information that may lead to better provision being made by the Western powers for protecting native Christians from persecution in China. "The subject," he continues, "is one of importance, and, although such persecution is clearly forbidden by treaty stipulation, there seems to be no prescribed manner for enforcing the prohibition, or for obtaining indemnity for losses sustained by its violation. I have tried to avoid troubling the department with the details of many cases of trouble in which missionaries from the United States of America and Europe and the native converts and co-workers, native preachers and helpers, have been involved, in this, the most turbulent consular district in China or in the world, but have labored faithfully and somewhat successfully in getting the difficulties adjusted as fairly and quietly as possible.

The persecutions of which the missionaries complain, comprise robbery or destruction of chapels; robbery, beating, blackmailing, and boycotting of native Christians, often with the encouragement of local authorities, and the refusal of the authorities to punish the offenders, protect the Christians, or take measures to seek restitution. It is not intended to leave the impression that the Chinese authorities have in every case been unwilling to deal justly by native Christians. On the contrary, the not infrequent aid rendered by local officials in suppressing outbreaks is gratefully acknowledged."

A NEATLY PRINTED SIXTEEN PAGE WEEKLY JOURNAL, UNSECTARIAN AND OPPOSED TO SECRET SOCIETIES.

THE POLE STAR OF REFORM.

EVERY Christian, every Prohibitionist and every Patriot should read it for the following among other reasons:

1. Because it meets the wants of the general public by giving in brief the latest reliable information on all questions of Reform, having the special object of exposing and opposing organized secrecy. Besides able editorial, contributed and selected articles upon this topic, which is of more than national importance, it has interesting sketches of progress and incidents from the reform lecturers in all parts of the country, reform news and notes, letters from the Old World, etc., etc. It is the especial organ of this movement in America—a movement which is sustained by the utterances of some of the ablest statesmen and divines whom the country has produced. Every person interested in either the family, government, or religion—the most sacred interests of humanity—is directly affected by secret societies, and needs to keep posted in this movement.

2. Because it is uncompromising on ALL questions of the day. On temperance, tobacco, Sabbath desecration, Mormonism, the Southern and Indian questions, civil-service reform, monopolies, the rights of labor, and every other question, its only aim is to be RIGHT, and advocate the TRUTH. It is hence FEARLESS and OUTSPOKEN.

2. Because it emphasizes the fact that political action should be directed by conscience enlightened by the WORD and SPIRIT of God and that Christ must be acknowledged KING of NATIONS, and presents a platform epitomizing the science of civil governments based on the supreme authority of the DIVINE WORD.

4. Because, in addition to these features, it contains a choice selection of wholesome reading for the family, from oldest to youngest, with religious and secular news, market reports, etc.

HOW PEAT IS GATHERED FOR FUEL.

The gathering of the peat harvest in many parts of Ireland and Scotland is a matter of much importance to the inhabitants, a wet season seriously interfering with the necessary operations. The cutting commences early in the season, as soon as the Winter and Spring rains have drained off the surface. In Ireland a long, narrow slip, measuring from three to six feet across, is cleared to the depth of a foot or so of the light, spongy peat and heather which form the surfaee. Extending back from this a certain space of surface, called in some districts a swarth, is levelled and prepared for the reception of the blocks of peat, which, as they are cut, are spread closely upon it to dry. The peat, or turf, as it is almost invariably called in that country, is cut into narrow, rectangular blocks, from one foot to eighteen inches in length. The instrument used in cutting, called a slanc, somewhat resembles a spade, with a flat piece of steel attached to the bottom, at the right side, and turned up at right angles. The blocks are cut from the mass with a downward thrust of the implement, the arms alone being used, without the use of the foot, as in an ordinary spake. After the blocks have lain for some time, and the sides and upper surface have dried somewhat, they are turned and then placed on end in small stacks, which are piled together in larger heaps as the drying process advances. The work of cutting, turning and stacking the peat is not such an unpleasan occupation as might be supposed. It is cleanly work enough. There is no need to handle the peat in a wet state, though even then it does not stain or stick to the hand or person, and has no unpleasant smell. When it is dried somewhat, it is light, clean, and easy to handle. It is unusual to cut the peat down to the level of the sod beneath, the produce of the lower layer, although most valuable as fuel, drying into hard and brittle frag ments, which do not bear handling or removal, When the upper matter is exhausted, the remainder is sometimes dug out, mixed with water, and kneaded together with the hands and feet. It is then cut in square blocks and dried in the ordinary way. The peat bogs of Ireland ought to be a source of considerable profit to that country; and but for the low heating power of peat, which renders it unfit for use as fuel for manufacturing purposes, they would no doubt have long ago led to the development in that country of industrial and manufacturing activity similiar, on a small scale, to that produced by coal in England. To remedy this defect in peat as a fuel various proprocesses have been tried for compressing it so as to get rid of the large percentage of water always present in the best dried samples. These experiments have not, up to the present, met with any great success when tried on a large scale. Well dried peat contains as much as twenty per cent. of water; and even when most of this is expelled, unless the peat is rendered compact and water-proof by some process, its spongy texture causes it to reabsorb a large proportion of moisture from the atmosphere —*N. "BETWEEN TWO OPINIONS."

The issue of this book at this time is opportune, for it provides for reformers a beautiful and timely gift for the holidays. President J. Blanchard says: "At the risk of being deemed an enthusiast, I would rather have written this book of Miss Flagg's than to have written Gray's Elegy, conquered Quebec or written Uncle Tom's Cabin, and we risk the opinion that every careful reader of Miss Flagg's volume who votes with the American party will concur with us in this estimate of it, extravagant as it may seem."

NEEDLE WORK

Needle-Work: A Manual of Stitches and Studies in Embroidery and Drawn Work. Edited by Jenny June.
This manual is an attempt to systematize and arrange in an order convenient for workers, the modern methods in Embroidery and Drawn Work. The author has felt the desire and the responsibility involved in aiding women to a true and practical guide to the beautiful art of needle-work. When the Angel of Mercy begged that woman might not be created because she would be abused by man, as the stronger, the Lord listened, but felt that he could not give up the whole scheme of creation, so he gave the loving Angel permission to bestow upon her any compensating gift she chose, and the Angel pityingly endowed her with tears and the love of needle-work. This book is printed on fine paper, has a handsome cover, and contains

HOME AND HEALTH.

DOMESTICITY AS A CAUSE OF INSANITY.

There is a "moral" worth pondering in the following brief extract from the "report of the Hartford Retreat for the Insane:"

Mrs. M——, aged forty-four, mother of eight children, acute mania. The husband, when asked if he could suggest any cause for her illiness, exclaimed with much animation, that he could not conceive any reason: "She is a most domestic woman; is always doing something for her children; is always at work for us all; never goes out of the house, even to church on Sunday; never goes gadding about at the neighbors' houses, or talking from one to another; has been one of the best of wives and mothers, and was always at home." The superintendent, in commenting on this case, says: "This appreciative husband could hardly have furnished a more graphic delineation of the causes of his wife's insanity, had he understood them never so thoroughly."

SORE THROAT.—Everybody has a cure for this trouble, but simple remedies seem to be the most effectual. Salt and water is used by many as a gargle, but a little alum and honey dissolved in sage tea is better. Others, a few drops of camphor on loaf sugar, which very often affords immediate relief. An application of cloths wrung out of hot water and applied to the neck, changed as often as it begins to cool, has the most potency in removing inflammation.

Another. Beat up the whites of two eggs with two spoonfuls of white sugar and add a pint of lukewarm water. Grate a little nutmeg into the mixture. Stir it well and drink a small portion frequently. The remedy is pleasant and certain.—National Independent.

CURE FOR LOCKJAW.—A correspondent of the Baltimore Sun says that when any one runs a nail or any sharp iron into any part of the frame, take a common smoke pipe, fill it with tobacco, light it well, then take a thin cloth or silk handkerchief, place it over the bowl of the pipe, and blow the smoke through the stem into the wound. Two or three pipes full will be sufficient to set the wound discharging. He has tried it on himself and five others, and found it to give immediate relief. If the wound has been of some days' standing it will open it again, if the tobacco is good.

REMEDY FOR HEADACHE.—A new remedy for the headache has been found by Dr Haley, an Australian physician, who says that for some years past he has found that minimum doses of iodide of potassium of great service in frontal headache, situated over the brow, and accompanied by languor, or chilliness and feeling of general discomfort, with distaste for food, which sometimes approaches nausea, can be completely removed by a two grain dose dissolved in half a wineglass of water, and this quietly sipped in about ten minutes. In many cases, he adds, the effect of these small doses has been simply wonderful—as, for instance, a person who a quarter of an hour before was feeling most miserable and refused all food, wishing only for quietness, would now take a good meal and resume his wonted cheerfulness.

A physician of a London hospital writes to the British Medical Journal: "There is no recognized reason why of late years neuralgia of the face and scalp should have increased so much in the female sex, as compared with our own. There is no doubt that is one of the most common of female maladies—one of most painful and difficult treatment. It is also a cause of much mental depression, and leads more often to habits of intemperance than any other. This growing prevalence of neuralgia may, to some extent, be referred to the effects of a cold upon the termimal branches of the nerves distributed to the skin; and the reason why men are less subject to it than women, may to a certain extent, be explained by the much greater protection afforded by the mode in which the former cover their heads when they are in the open air. It may be observed that the surface of the head that is actually covered in man, is at least three times that which fashion allows to woman; indeed, the points of contact between the hat or bonnet and the head of the lattter are so irregular as practically to destroy any protection which might otherwise be afforded."

This Washboard is made of one solid sheet of heavy corrugated zinc, which produces a double-faced board of the best quality and durability. The fluting is very deep, holding more water, and consequently doing better washing than any washboard in the market. The frame is made of hard wood and held together with an iron bolt running through a tube formed on the lower edge of the zinc, thus binding the whole together in the most substantial manner, and producing a washboard which for economy, excellence and durability, is unquestionably the best in the world. We find so many dealers that object to our board on account of its DURABILITY, saying, "It will last too long We can never sell a customer but one." We take this means to advise customers to INSIST upon having the NORTH STAR WASHBOARD.

The best is the cheapest.

We will forward board on receipt of price.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

WASHINGTON.

President Cleveland Thursday appointed Frederick H. Winston, of Chicago, to be Minister Resident and Consul General for the United States in Persia.

Secretary Bayard does not contemplate making any changes in the consular service in the countries south of us for some time yet. It is the policy of the State Department to cultivate more friendly relations with Mexico and the South and Central American people, and to extend our commercial intercourse in that direction.

The work of reorganizing the civil service commission is found by President Cleveland to be one of great difficulty, especially as the salaries are limited to $3 500 per annum. Among a number who have declined to serve are M. L. Saltonstall and Charles Codman of Massachusetts.

COUNTRY.

Preparations are being made for a fine exhibition of fat stock and dairy products at the Chicago exposition building Nov. 10 to 19. The produce exchange has appointed a committee of thirty members, and the governors of all the States have been invited.

The colored citizens of Mississippi have opened at Jackson a State fair which is highly creditable in the line of needlework, farm products and blooded stock. The exhibition is said to have received every encouragement from the people of the State.

A squash 85 inches in circumference, and weighing 173 pounds is on exhibition at Brooklyn, Iowa. A farmer near Tolono, Ill., found on one vine six pumpkins with a combined weight of 512 pounds.

Gen. George B. McClellan died of neuralgia of the heart at his residence at St. Cloud, Orange Mountain, N. J., early on Thursday morning aged 59.

Dr. Noah Porter, President of Yale University, tendered his resignation on Thursday, to take effect next commencement.

An explosion occurred on the propeller Myles at Duluth Thursday afternoon, the 1st and 2d engineers being killed and the vessel badly damaged. The steam cooked the bodies of the victims.

A. P. Burrus shot Miss Lillian Walter and her sister, Mrs. Ray Good, on Wednesday evening as they were leaving Dun & Co.'s office in Chicago, where they were employed. The day before Burrus had been dismissed because he gave utterance to slanderous remarks about the characters of his victims, and the shooting was done through revenge. Burrus was chased by a crowd who would probably have lynched him but for the timely arrival of an officer. The women were conveyed to the hospital and at last report were improving, although at first their wounds were pronounced fatal.

George Washington, a colored citizen of East St. Louis, paid no attention to threats of tar and feathers unless he separated from his white wife. Wednesday evening he awoke to find a mob tearing down his house, and he was compelled to flee for his life.

In a foundry at St. Louis a moulder named Scott Thomas undertook to pour five tons of molten iron into a pit fourteen feet deep, and met a horrible death by the breaking of a manila rope supporting the ladle.

The meteor which recently fell near Owatonna, Minn., has been blasted with dynamite, and half a ton of fragments are being sent to various parts of the country.

The fall of a horse on the Jerome Park track Thursday caused three others, with their jockeys, to tumble over her. The horse was killed and a rider fatally injured.

The trial of Ferdinand Ward, the swindler who ruined Gen. Grant, last year, was concluded Wednesday. The jury returned a verdict of guilty of grand larceny, the maximum penalty for which is ten years imprisonment, and which sentence was pronounced upon him by the court on Saturday. He was at once sent to Sing Sing and on Monday set to work in the stove factory. His term may be reduced three years and a half by good behavior.

A difficulty has arisen at Eau Claire, Wis., owing to the closing of the schools by the Mayor and Board of Health, who feared a spread of diptheria, thirty-four cases of which have been reported. The School Board and school officers protest, and threaten to prosecute the policemen who prevented pupils and teachers from entering the buildings.

A dense fog at New York Wednesday morning retarded navigation, and the ferryboat Hackensack was in collision with the steamer Servia, causing a panic among the passengers of both vessels, several persons jumping overboard in their fright, among them a sailor, who was drowned. The bow of the ferryboat was carried away.

At E. Saginaw, Mich., Wednesday evening a tug took fire at the dock and a large crowd gathered on an adjacent bridge, when a piece of walk on the bridge five feet wide and forty-five feet long, containing about sixty people, gave way with a crash precipitating them into the river, which is fifteen to eighteen feet deep, with a strong current. The night was dark, but the greater number were rescued after a terrible fright. Some thirteen were reported missing.

FOREIGN.

The premier of Servia has sent to the powers a note expressing a desire for peace on the basis of the treaty of Berlin, with a restoration of Turkish authority in Bulgaria and Eastern Roumelia. Thirty Greeks who were found in an open boat at the entrance to the Bosphorus claimed to have fled from Bulgaria to avoid military service.

M. De Freycinet, the French minister of foreign affairs, while being driven to the door of his office in Paris, was fired upon by a man in the roadway. The first shot failed and the would-be assassin was seized before he could fire a second time. He is a Corsican.

The famous "Great Eastern," the largest vessel in the world, was sold at public auction Wednesday for £26,200.

The conference of the great powers for the adjustment of the Bulgarian-Roumelian controversy is meeting at Constantinople.

The German liberal party carried the elections for delegates to choose members of the Prussian diet.

A dispatch from Rome states that the Pope has decided entirely in favor of Spain in the Carolines question.

The hurricane on the Labrador coast from October 11th to 15th was unprecedented. Over seventy fishing vessels and 300 lives were lost. There is no telegraphic communication and the particulars are meager. The bark "Nellie" returned to St. John's with 200 shipwrecked men, women and children. Several women died from exposure and others were drowned.

The steamship Canadian reports considerable distress on the Labrador coast, on account of a failure of the fisheries. At Esquimaux Point, out of a population of 150 families, only twenty have supplies for winter; thirty more expect to get advances from the merchants to pull them through but the remaining 100 families have nothing, and it will be necessary to send supplies or bring them off the coast. The failure of the fisheries is attributed to the ice last spring. The fall fishing has been poor owing to rough weather.

Three thousand Frenchmen have died from cholera in Tonquin within the last nine months.

Turkey has decided to await the decision of the great powers on the question of the Bulgarian union before sending troops into Roumelia. Meantime warlike preparations continue on every hand.

The grand jury has found a true bill against Mr. Stead, editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, London, and the other prisoners for abduction, conspiracy, and indecent assault.

The action of Mr. Ross Winans, the Baltimore millionaire, who owns an extensive deer park in Scotland, in closing a roadway on his property, so angered the people in that vicinity that they mobbed and stoned him on Sunday last. Mr. Winans has offered a reward of £500 for the capture of the culprits.

A powerful committee composed of Lords Bandon and Castletown, and other prominent gentlemen, has been formed in London, to assist the people of every class in Ireland who have been boycotted, and to advance funds to all persons or corporations willing to oppose boycotting.

ADAM CROOKS.—It must be regretted that unlooked-for circumstances prevent the appearance of the portrait of this loved and honored man, as promised two weeks ago. The postponement will make it more eagerly welcomed next week. How many of our readers will meantime secure a new subscriber who will be blessed in reading the story of that good man's life and his sufferings and victories for the truth?

President Cleveland was visited the other day by a company of Presbyterian ministers who were attending presbytery in Washington. He received them with more than ordinary cordiality, and in his response to their address referred to his early training. He had been taught the Catechism when a boy, and could still repeat it. If any are inclined to doubt the statement they may read a confirmation of it in the Thanksgiving proclamation issued last week, which appears elsewhere. Since the time of Lincoln we do not remember a document of the kind so fervent in its religious tone. If we do not find a cause for thanksgiving in Mr. Cleveland, let us in his mother.

The sudden death of General McClellan from heart disease is giving another lesson to our tobacco-using Americans. His case, like that of General Grant and Senator Hill, seems to be one of tobacco suicide. The neuralgia of the heart was brought on, his physician, Dr. Seward, thinks, from this cause—"possibly, too much smoking may have weakened the action of the heart." A writer in the Independent quotes General Grant as having given a careful advice to our young men against the tobacco habit, but not until he felt that it had given him a death blow did he cease himself. Would that these striking examples might begin to speak more powerfully even than the words of warning, which we regret these great men refrained from uttering while they could.

Less than three years ago John F. Burrill, of Springfield, Ill., was sentenced for five years in the penitentiary for embezzling several thousand dollars from the Grand Lodge of Illinois Masons. He had served for several terms as secretary, and though his thieving might have been easily discovered, he was not brought to justice for some time, when he had removed from the State and had shown his capacity for devilish deeds in his treatment of his wife and family. The beautiful doctrines of Freemasonry in which he was so well instructed had the effect of developing in his case adultery and theft. Though he was tried by procurement of the lodge, we never learned that he was ever expelled for un-Masonic conduct, or for any other reason. Now when his term is about one-half expired, Governor Oglesby intervenes with a pardon, which, if the truth were to be known, we believe would be found to have originated among his brother Masons, who concluded that his punishment satisfied the demands of the order; and Governor Oglesby was very obedient to the order, no matter for the courts, or law, or justice.

The Philadelphia meeting of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union was a wonderful gathering, magnificent in its enthusiasm, its numbers and its devotion to the temperance reform. As John Wannamaker, the great Philadelphia merchant, said of it, "To see the meeting only, is answer enough to those who criticise and condemn its support of the Prohibition party." Francis E. Willard was again re-elected by an almost unanimous vote; the headquarters, heretofore at New York, were voted to Chicago, the "hub of the American universe," as one of the delegates exclaimed. The directors of the Union Signal reported that they had circulated 13,000,000 pages of reading matter. The resolutions favor woman suffrage, and reaffirm the sympathy of the body to be with the Prohibition party, in these words: "We reaffirm the position taken at the St. Louis Convention in 1884 pledging our influence to the party that will furnish the best embodiment to prohibition, that we will continue to lend our influence to the party that declares for prohibition and home protection." This was not without a contest. A minority report was presented, but the vote was 243 to 29. To read the report of this convention, so full of prayer and so full of power, it would seem as if Dr. Storrs, in his apostrophe to woman's work before the American Board, had by forecast borrowed inspiration for these eloquent words: "Their delicate hands hold at this hour, I firmly believe, the levers which must lift the moral and Christian civilization of the world. It is theirs to set in swifter motion the wheels of beryl, vivid with life, which are under the throne. It is theirs to open for tribes and people the gates of light."

New York has raised nearly a hundred thousand dollars for a Grant monument, Chicago about one-half as much, and other cities, States or societies have been gathering together their funds for this purpose. But General Grant in his own spirited account of the battles of Lookout Mountain and Mission Ridge, in the November Century, suggests the memorial which would be most enduring, most appropriate to the character of the man and most honorable to the nation whom he served. He writes: "There was no time during the rebellion when I did not think, and often say, that the South was more to be benefited by defeat than the North." And with the passing away of the conquering mind the South begins to realize how true are these words, for defeat cut off the burden that was sinking the South into vandalism. When this great conception of Grant's shall be fully received, as it must be, both North and South may join in doing honor to the memory of the two men whom God raised up to be the instruments of his providence in removing this incubus—Lincoln who gave the order and Grant who executed it. Then may the whole nation, without regard to sections, or classes, or race, join in a memorial to Grant and appropriately also to Lincoln at once: and what better than a memorial day, ranking with the fourth of July, and what better day than the 22nd of September, the date of the Emancipation proclamation? Lincoln's monument is already tumbling in pieces, but a national holiday for Lincoln, Grant and Emancipation, would be a monument imperishable as the sentiments of patriotism, honor and liberty in American bosoms.

It is said that lately four thousand Chinamen, frightened and driven away by the outrages to which they are subjected by Irishmen and other foreigners in this country, have lately embarked in four steamers for home. No wonder they regard our shores as most inhospitable. Following the Rock Spring massacre and the mobs of Seattle, the Chinese were last Tuesday driven from Tacoma. The time had been set, and hundreds of whites marched coolly to the Chinese houses, ordered the occupants to pack up; their goods loaded on drays and taken miles out of the city with the owners. At Pasadena, California, twenty-four hours were given Saturday for the Chinese to leave; and the Knights of Labor in San Francisco have called a mass-meeting, November 28th, to demand the removal of the hated Mongolians from that city. But the mobs and lodges are not to have their way unchallenged. President Cleveland ordered the rioters at Seattle to disperse by noon of the 8th and sent ten companies of troops after the order, with a revenue cutter and a battery of artillery. The grand jury at Tacoma has indicted thirty-two citizens of that city, including the mayor, city editors, and other prominent persons; and possibly the government will follow up the matter so vigorously as to suppress what appears to be a general uprising against the Chinese. Suppose, ignoring treaties, our English and American traders in Chinese cities should be assailed and driven out. They are aliens in that land, making money to spend in retirement at home; their habits and probably their religion offensive to the natives. The prompt declaration of a war of reprisal would show how Christian we are! But what of the labors of our missionaries when these 4,000 return? These will be missionaries, too, and their message will have a vehemence that must prevail against the other. Surely our Chinese promises to be more disastrous than our Indian policy.

PROFESSOR JOHN MORGAN ON THE GIFT OF THE HOLY GHOST.

BY REV. C. CONKLING.

A true, effectual and proper answer to how to deal with a wrong, would excite opposition. Christ gave such an answer, and had to die for it. So did John the Baptist. So did Owen P. Lovejoy, the Abolitionist. So did all who laid down their lives for the Union. Where they do not die, they have always to suffer. Witness the taunts, jeers and railery suffered by Christ! "He hath a devil and is mad." John 10:20. "Behold a gluttonous man and a winebibber, a friend of publicans and sinners! But Wisdom is justified of all her children." Luke 7:34, 35. "He saved others, himself he cannot save." Mark 15:30. "Prophesy unto us, thou Christ, who is he that smote thee?" I use the name of Christ as representative. Being faultless did not save him from attack. Witness at all times, then, the result of announcing the answer to the question how to deal with any moral wrong whatsoever,—opposition in every conceivable manner and degree, from a curl of the lip, to the infliction of death. Recall the epithets applied to the Abolitionists: "Black Abolitionists," "D—d Abolitionists," "Amalgamationists," "Negro worshippers." Recall those applied to the Prohibitionists. "Lunk-heads," "Disgruntled office-seekers," "Boodles," "Fanatics."

The same manifestion is often witnessed in the Christian world. A true and proper answer to how to deal with a wrong starts a commotion. The effort is to suppress the answer, to put it down, to reject, misrepresent and falsify it, the authors often never suspecting they thus evince a horrible unfitness for the kingdom of heaven.

I have written the foregoing to introduce, as far as possible, to the attention of the Christian church the answer to the question of all wrong at its rise—an answer transcending, therefore, any other knowledge in importance of which I am aware, and one that receives (for the reason I have already given, and for no other reason that a true and proper answer to how to deal with a wrong excites antagonism), and always will receive the concentrated opposition of all, in the church or out matters not, until they receive it, and are transferred from the army of the opposition to the side of peace. This answer is found in a small book, costing twenty-five cents, written by John Morgan, co-worker with President C. G. Finney, and professor of Biblical literature in the theological department of Oberlin College. The book is entitled "The Gift of the Holy Ghost," contains from seventy to eighty pages, and an introduction by President Finney, who says, page 5: "It was, and is, one of the ablest articles upon that subjet that has ever been published here." Though written years since, as Oberlin thought on the great answer which was moving the world, it is yet the newest of the new, as much so as if written an hour ago, and yet is the oldest of the old as it spreads out an integral part of the Gospel from the great day when Christianity was first promulgated.

The book in the first instance is for the heart, and not for the intellect. A mistake at this point, substituting the intellect for the heart, or looking into it, only ends in opposition and illustrates all I have said. Without the heart to accept the answer it contains, we are all a company of opposers every time the answer is given; and on the announcement of none so quick as upon that announced in this work. And yet, secondarily, the book is for the intellect—the very strongest—as thus only can the heart to receive the great answer be served aright, and clothed with humility and power. It is not, therefore, written for controversy, but to conduct the church over and beyond controversy, into God. "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear."

The fundamental propositions of the book are that after men are converted to God, or born again, or have become believers, there is a special divine endowment for them that ends the old life of sin; that this endowment of them was commenced and illustrated in full for the first time in history at Jerusalem ten days after Christ ascended to heaven; and that when received by them they are fruitful unto good works and zeal in this life. Have you, reader, as a believer, received this endowment?

It is impossible that the leaven of the answer in this book should not yet leaven the world.

CHRIST AN IMPOSTOR IF NOT GOD.

BY WM. BROWN.

Some Unitarians believe that Christ was a mere man: others think he was more than a man; but not God. We will quote his own words (John 8: 58): "Before Abraham was, I am." Mark, he does not say, Before Abraham was, I was; but "Before Abraham was, I AM." The use of the present tense denotes, not only that he existed before Abraham, but that he exists through all time.

The same expression occurs in Ex. 3: 13, 14: "And Moses said unto God, Behold, when I come unto the children of Israel and shall say unto them, The God of your fathers hath sent me unto you; and they shall say to me, What is his name? what shall I say unto them? And God said unto Moses, I AM THAT I AM: and he said, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I AM hath sent me unto you."

Here God distinguishes himself by the name, "I Am," because all time centers in him as the self-existent and eternal Jehovah. Also in the next verse God says, "This is my name forever, and this is my memorial unto all generations." Hence, for the same reason, Christ declares that he is "I AM." In John 8: 24 he says, "For if ye believe not that I AM, ye shall die in your sins." Christ is therefore, according to his own testimony, the self-existent and eternal God, which if he is not, it is evident that he was a deceiver, and well might the Jews accuse him of blasphemy because that he being only a man, made himself God.

How wicked it was in Mohammed in pretending to be a prophet, and also that by night he had visited the heavenly Jerusalem, in order to deceive a whole world, if he could, for the selfish reason of thus obtaining a great name and being called a prophet; but on the supposition that Christ was a mere man, I ask, is there any comparison between the sin which was committed by him and the sin of Mohammed? Evidently there is not, and for these reasons:

First. Mohammed never claimed to be greater than a prophet, while Jesus declared that he himself was the Almighty, the self-existent and eternal Jehovah.

Second. Mohammed never demanded such honor as we owe to God; but Christ says that "all men should honor the Son, even as they honor the Father," and in the third chapter of John he calls himself "the only begotten Son of God." He thus distinguishes himself from both men and angels, and says that we should honor him even as we honor the Father.

Now in what way is it possible for Unitarians to justify Jesus in making such a claim, and demanding of us such honor as we give to God? If he is not God, he is but a creature, and such a claim was blasphemy; because he attempted to rob God of the honor which is his due, deceive man, and cause him to bestow such honor upon a mere creature as should be cheerfully given to "Him in whom we live, and move, and have our being."

Third. Mohammed never permitted any of his fellow-men to worship him. Let us see if Christ had any scruples on this subject. "Behold there came a certain ruler and worshiped him." "Then they that were in the ship came and worshiped him." "And he said, Lord, I believe, and he worshiped him."

There are numerous instances in which Jesus was worshiped. Now had he been but a man, how could he be justified in permitting his equals to worship him without a word of correction? Once Peter rebuked Cornelius for worshiping him. Paul and Barnabas were shocked when the people at Lystra wished to pay them homage. An angel, in heaven, felt unworthy to be worshiped by John. But this Jesus whom Unitarians are constantly holding up as our model, in word and practice, and at the same time denying him to be God, permitted the leper, his disciples, the blind man, and many others, to worship him without ever intimating that they did anything wrong in so doing; but so far from it that he actually says that all men should honor him even as they honor God. Hence Jesus not only claims to be God, but he also demands our worship.

On the supposition that Christ was only a man, it is evident that if he was justifiable in what he said, so would we be justifiable in speaking the same things. Such being the case, I will repeat a number of statements which were made by him. "I am the living bread which came down from heaven." In what sense can Christ be the living bread which came down from heaven if he was only a man? If he was not more than man then we are his equals, and could any of us truly say; "I am the living bread which came down from heaven"?

Again Jesus says that "No man knoweth the Son, but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him." But, "Who by searching can find out God? Who can find out the Almighty unto perfection?" God only can know himself. Yet Christ, whom Unitarians say was only a man, declares that he knows God as completely as God knows him, and, also, that no man knows God except him to whom he pleases to reveal him.

In the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew, Christ exalts himself above all other men, insomuch, that he says, he is to be their final Judge, separate them one from another as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats, and give unto each his final destiny—eternal punishment or reward as he sees fit. On that occasion he says he is to be accompanied by all the holy angels, and that they are to be his ministering spirits.

But, I imagine, that Unitarians will ask how we know that Christ ever made these statements; because they say that the evangelists were only partially inspired, that they were imperfect men; that the Bible has been translated by prejudiced minds, and in many ways corrupted: hence we do not now see the Scriptures in their original form.

It is true that the sacred historians were imperfect men, and that the Bible has often been translated, and, perhaps, by prejudiced minds; but if we do not see the Scriptures as they were formerly written it is because of our ignorance—not because they do not remain in their original form. Thousands of copies of the New Testament have been printed in Greek, also copies nearly as ancient as Christianity itself have been preserved in many countries, in many languages, and by every sect. Hence to speak of the Scriptures as having been corrupted, is only an excuse.

Christians have been formed into sects from the commencement, and their mutual jealousies and watchfulness over each other must have made the corruption of the Scriptures impossible, because as soon as one party would make an alteration it would have been observed and exposed by another. One remarkable proof of the superintending care of God over his own Word in preventing its corruption by prejudice or sectarian interest is this: the Roman Catholics worship God by images, yet they have not dared to alter those passages that forbid such worship, though their own Bible condemns their practice. The corruption of the Scriptures is, therefore, impossible.

But it may be said by Freethinkers that they were corrupted by the early church before the many different denominations were formed. To this I will make a short reply by asking, What was the early church? It will doubtless be said by Unitarians that it was what is now called a Unitarian church, and that Jesus was himself a Unitarian. Now if such is true—if the first church was Unitarian, and if the Scriptures were corrupted before the different sects came into being—then they must have been corrupted by the Unitarians; for who else could have corrupted them if they were the only Christian church of that age?

SOCIETY AND GOVERNMENT.

BY CYRUS SMITH.

Society is benfited by Christianity the same as "righteousness exalteth a nation." This nation has been "exalted" above many evils. It was "righteousness" that gave us our "Declaration of Independence." "All men are born free and equal, and have a right to life, liberty, and happiness." This Declaration, investigated in the light of God's Word, is a beacon light to the oppressed of the world. Free thought, free speech, and free investigation, are the American freeman's birth-right; eternal vigilance in this respect is required of us to maintain our liberties. The investigation of the Declaration of Independence has benefited the world, and good society and good government are benefited by a free and open investigation of their principles; the examination of institutions of opposite principles is demanded to protect that which is good, and that we may avoid being controlled by their form of government and society. This government and Christian society has been blessed by the application of just principles, and patriots are glad that our light has blessed other nations. But if our government was founded upon principles that could not be investigated, it would prove a curse to us, and would blacken the history of the world. The more the principles upon which this government is founded are investigated by master minds, the brighter will shine our part in the world's history, if we are loyal to her principles. Righteous principles, the better they are known, the brighter they shine. Secret societies are founded upon principles opposed to "free thought, free speech, and free investigation."

What is a secret society? A society that could not be investigated would be a genuine one; but such a society is an impossibility. Every society claiming to be secret is a fraud, a deception, a swindle.

If there was anything good in a secret society it could not let it out and remain secret. Freemasonry, the most prominent (so-called) secret society has been exposed by good men who have renounced and left it forever; but they tell us such men are bad and cannot be believed. If they are, Masonry has made them so, for the order "receives none but good men;" so if they cannot tell the truth, Masonry is to blame for it.

According to the Word of God it is impossible for society or government to remain founded upon the principles of secrecy, "For nothing is secret that shall not be made manifest; neither anything hid, that shall not be known and come abroad." Luke 8: 17. "For there is nothing covered that shall not be revealed, neither hid that shall not be known." Luke 12: 2. "For there is nothing covered that shall not be revealed, and hid that shall not be known." Matthew 10: 26. "For there is nothing hid, which shall not be manifested; neither was anything kept secret, but that it should come abroad." Mark 4: 22.

The attempt to found society and government on the principles of secrecy has caused more harm to the cause of Christ than all other evils combined because they seek to control the church. If the church was free from the lodge there would not be so much danger. If the church should be fully controlled by the principles of secrecy, she would be debased as was the church of Rome by the society of the Jesuits, and the Stars and Stripes would shield only corruption.

INDIAN NAMES FOR THE SUPREME BEING.—Dr. Brinton thinks that the term "Great Spirit" was probably learned from white intercourse, as it is not found in the oldest forms of worship. The mistranslated Algonkin word for this, Manito, is really the wonder-worker, wonder-actor. The Aztec's expression for deity means, "He that is and has been," an identification with time. The Shawnees' word means, "He who causes all." In the Cherokee it is "The Master of Breath" (a nearer approach to the Latin idea of spirit). The Quitchee god, among the Incas of Peru, "came among men doing good."

REFORMATION.

O God! look down from heav'n, and see
A sight that well may move thee!
Thy saints, how few! How wretchedly
Forsaken we who love thee!
Thy Word no more shall have its right;
And faith itself is vanished quite
From all this generation.

Fictions they teach with cunning art,
And lies of man's invention;
Not grounded in God's Word, their heart
Is full of strange dissension:
One chooses this, another that,
And while they make us separate,
They cant of love and union.

May God root out all falsehood's love,
And such as thus betray us;
Whereto their proud tongue all the more
Yet mocks: "Who dare gainsay us!"
"We, we have might and right alone,
What we prescribe must stand; we own
None as our lord and master."

Wherefore, saith God, I will arise!
My poor they are oppressing;
I hear their crying and their sighs,
Their wrongs shall have redressing;
My Word, endued with saving might,
Shall suddenly the wicked smite,
And be my poor ones' comfort.

As silver sev'n times furnace-tried,
Is found for it the purer,
So doth the Word, whate'er betide,
But prove itself the surer:
The cross reveals its worth aright,
'Tis then we see its strength and light
Shine far in earth's dark places.

O God! keep thou it pure and free
From this vile generation,
And let us too be kept by thee
From their abomination:
The wicked walk about at ease,
When loose, ungodly men like these
Are in the land exalted.

—Martin Luther.

SOCIETIES OF VENGEANCE.

A correspondent of the Inter Ocean, about the time of the shooting of Captain Phelan by Richard Short, in O'Donovan Rossa's office in New York, wrote that the assault would "certainly have the effect of directing public attention toward the true character of the Irish secret societies, which are said to exist in the principal cities of the United States. In many quarters the Fenian Brotherhood has already been identified with the assassination. The theory is that Captain Phelan was a traitor to the cause, and that Short was merely the instrument of vengeance employed by O'Donovan Rossa and the other members of his secret society.

"People may deplore the existence of secret associations which are prepared to enforce their principles by the rope, the bullet, or the knife, but such societies have existed in all times and doubtless will exist so long as men think they have grievances to redress. One of the most famous organizations of this description is the one which really gave us the word 'assassin.' As described by Gibbon in his 'Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire,' it was founded about 1090 by Hasan-ben-Sadah, whose followers were devoted to the duty of murder in whichever direction was indicated by their chief. To inspire them with desperate ferocity he gave them hashish, the well-known deadly decoction of hemp. Hence they were called hashisheens, which by an easy transition became 'assassins,' as the word is now known throughout the world. Under the guidance of their chief, whose title was the Old Man of the Mountain, they overran Persia and Syria, sacking cities, and killing and maiming wherever they went. Their name became a terror throughout a large portion of Asia. Their audacity was marvelous—a fact which they exemplified in the manner they murdered the Marquis de Montferrat, Lewis of Bavaria, and the Khan of Tartary. It was not until the middle of the thirteenth century that the assassins were finally extirpated.

"The most famous European secret society was undoubtedly the Holy Vehmgericht, which executed its decrees in Germany with inexorable severity for centuries. It was so powerful that kings, princes, nobles, and people of all classes acknowledeged and bowed to its decrees in silence. Founded in the reign of Charlemagne, ostensibly to maintain religion and the public peace, the great Vehmic tribunal attained its greatest power in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. It was no respector of persons. The most exalted, as well as the poorest, were seized, tried, and executed by it with merciless severity. It was not suppressed until the sixteenth century, although an attempt was made to revive it in Westphalia, near the beginning of the present century. Those who have read Scott's "Anne of Geierstein" will remember the thrilling account which he gives of the mysterious proceedings of the Vehmic tribunal, which met in caves and forests under a president, the grim emblems of whose office were the sword and cord which hung by his side. In the fourteenth century the Rosicrucian Mystics became a powerful secret organization throughout Europe, and they, too, were known to enforce their principles by secret assassination. In our times Nihilism has become a very terrible secret organization.

"The Fenian Brotherhood, established somewhere about 1858, promised at one time to become an exceedingly powerful secret organization, but internal jealousies and discords have hitherto prevented it, as they did Ribbonism, from becoming a formidable homogeneous political engine. That assassination is held by the brotherhood to be justifiable under certain circumstances there is abundant proof. To prove this one need only recall the assassination of Burke and Lord Cavendish in the Phœnix Park, the assassination of Carey, and the mysterious triple assassination in Dublin, when the victims were men who had been denounced as traitors to the brotherhood."

LIFE ASSOCIATIONS.

That inasmuch as the associations of life have a powerful influence in moulding character, all who would live holily should not enter into marriage relations or business partnerships calculated to hinder them; nor become connected with secular or secret societies, which are prohibited by such Scriptures as the following: "Have no fellowship with unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them."—Declaration of the Chicago Holiness Assembly.

Let us comment a little on the points enumerated.

1. Unholy Marriages. Marriage is holy, but there are marriages which are unholy. Many marriages, we all know, are entered into from impure motives, such as money, and worldly advantage, and lust. The holy will not intend to err in either of these particulars; but without looking carefully to Jesus, and keeping all their desires in the hands of the Lord, they will go astray and fall. And though they may possibly recover in spirituality, the results will be disastrous; there will be great trouble in the flesh. David's case is a conspicuous example. "He that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption."

The young disciple needs warning on this marriage question; and so, of course, do many others. Many are spoiled for life, so far as special influence is concerned, because of an unhappy marriage. The apostolic injunction, and none other, is the safe one —to marry only "in the Lord."

But it will not be out of place to admonish the married, that if they begin at any time to think themselves mismated, they have no Gospel liberty to let their affections run out after others. This is mischief and sin. It is hypocrisy and rebellion against God. It is a silent free-loveism, alike discreditable to decency and holiness.

2. Unholy Business Partnerships. We discover these all around us. An attempt, in the person of his desciples, to yoke Christ and Belial together. We are in no wise disposed to call all partnerships of the pure and the impure, unholy partnerships; for in some circumstances they are so very well arranged that goodness is not unevenly yoked. But such is not the case where a holy man's money is put into a pile that is all more or less to be governed and used unholily. Take, for instance, stock in a Sunday-running cheese-factory, a horse-racing fair, and a Sabbath-breaking railroad; also any business, either as joint-proprietor or laborer, though of a more private nature, where Sabbath-breaking is made necessary. There are kinds of business that are totally dishonoring to God, which the holy man is expected to let alone; but there are other kinds that are equally dishonoring to him in some of their branches, and are equally to be avoided. We may reach a curse by giving our children money to use in an unholy business. Two things require our care; the first that the devil and unholiness do not get our money; and the other that none of the money of Satan and unholiness is allowed to dirty our own pockets.

3. Secular or Secret Societies. Jesus the Christ, when finally arraigned, testified, "In secret have I said nothing." The closer we keep to his method the better. He had no secret principles, and no secret following, and no secret oaths, and no secret ceremonies; all was immediately or in short process of time revealed. There were the common prudences of intercourse—and these continue in his church to the present day—but how changed is all this in the close clans around us. They can underhandedly destroy a reputation, a property interest, and even a life, with none to stay the foul hand of desolation and death. Their obligations, if good, may well be submitted to holy scrutiny; if bad—and in some cases they are simply terrible—they should not exist at all. As for Christianity, we find many of them ignoring it, and far worse, for they reject the name of our Christ, and are conclaves of deism

There is a class of hangers-on to secrecy in the form of sick benefit and insurance societies. When Christians learn to trust God fully, they will let these subterfuges alone.

Many think the secret temperance lodges are doing a good work. But this is the work they are doing: they are debauching the public on secrecy in general, and preparing the way for the worst secret combinations, up (or down) to Nihilism. And if their temperance work be good, let them throw open their doors for its general diffuson and enjoyment.

Charles Jewett, of Massachusetts, is a widely known temperance advocate. We heard him thirty-six or thirty-seven years ago. He says: "I have worked in good faith for years with and for the Sons of Temperance and Good Templars, believing all the while that open societies would serve our purpose better, and that their re-establishment, with the addition of a proper financial feature, would be found to be a necessity before a triumph can be reached. I saw, however, that close organizations must have a trial, and a thorough one before the earnest and excellent brethren, working in and through them, could be made to see the necessity of other forms. They have been tried for nearly twice the period which we worked in open organizations; and for one, I think it is time to look at the facts as they are, and instead of an obstinate adherence to existing and partial methods only, see if some methods cannot be devised for bringing our whole force into the field." Sensible advice, truly.

As for "secular" societies not secret, they may or may not glorify God, according to their specific character. There is a whole brood of them that were hatched out in the pit. They reek with corruption, and their touch is death. Let them alone forever!—D., in the Christian Harvester.

KNIGHTS OF THE GARTER.

The suit which a man named Goldsmith brings against Jay Gould for services rendered, has developed the fact that in 1882 an aristocratic society known as the Knights of the Golden Garter was organized. Its primary object was to secure the re-election of Governor Cornell, and beyond that the witnesses in the present action say not. From the general character of Mr. Cornell's associates, and the fact that he was interested with several prominent capitalists in a blind pool at about that time, the personnel of the Knights may be imagined, but it is of more interest now to know whether the organization has been continued and what its present objects are.

Americans are justly suspicious of secret political societies. The Knights of the Golden Garter may be harmless millionaires who desire nothing but peace and justice, but that is what the Knights of the Golden Circle claimed that they wanted, and yet they were everywhere abhorred and feared. The name of the new society has an aristocratic sound which will grate harshly upon the ears of the average citizen, and there will be a desire to know more about the men who bear it and the aims which they have in view. The Knights supported Cornell in 1882 and were beaten. Who are they working for this year? Citizens anxious to know how not to vote would like further information on this point. —Chicago Herald, Oct. 24.

Upon the subject of conferring honorary titles or degrees, a practice which is certainly not on the wane, the Moravian expresses the opinion that if it continues at the present rate of acceleration, there will be before long more doctors of various kinds in the land than people without degrees, and that "soon it will be more of a distinction to have a plain name without any appendage, than one ornamented and adorned with prefix and suffix." I remember to have seen it stated, years ago, that it was altogether distasteful to the excellent and learned Presbyterian minister, the late Albert Barnes, to be addressed as "Reverend." The like statement has been made with respect to the eminent Baptist preacher, Charles Spurgeon. Within a few years there have been quite a number of religious journals established in this country as exponents of the views of those who have come out from the Methodists, Congregationalists, Wesleyans, etc., and who are opposed to clerical titles, to secret societies, fashionable attire, and similiar alliances with the world's spirit. Nevertheless, it is not now uncommon for our own members to use clerical titles in connection with ministers of other denominations, and themselves submit to be so styled, without correction or rebuke.—Josiah W. Leeds.

THE SECRET EMPIRE.

THE ILLINOIS GRAND LODGE.

The conclusion of our review of the late meeting of Illinois Masons was unavoidably postponed last week. It had been shown that the actual number of Masons in the State was less by some 46; but there are other indications also of the lapse of Masonry. From the secretary's report it appears that 132 lodges, or one-fifth of the whole number, have done no Masonic work during the year, that is, have worked not a single degree. They are, therefore, losing their interest in the affairs of Masonry, and fast losing that peculiar qualification of Masons, which in lodge parlance is called "bright." There is also a pecuniary loss to the order through these inactive lodges which is thus noted in the report:

"Among these lodges which have conferred no degrees are twenty-five which have an aggregate membership of only 460, which pay altogether Grand Lodge dues of only $347.25, and which draw for mileage and per diem $671.10. These twenty-five lodges cost the Grand Lodge on the average 70 cents per member. Among these twenty-five lodges is one that has not conferred a degree for over ten years, which pays $10.50 dues, and receives over twice as much for mileage and per diem. This lodge costs 76¼ cents for each member. But this lodge is not alone, for another lodge has conferred no degrees in over seven years, and draws $12.75 more a year from the Grand Lodge than it pays to it as dues. This lodge costs 60 cents a year per member. Another Lodge has conferred only one third degree in seven years, and draws $1.44 more per member for mileage and per diem than it pays for Grand Lodge dues. Still another lodge, which has raised but one Master Mason in six years, draws $16.50 more than it pays. In this case each member becomes an annual tax of $1.27 on this grand body. So another lodge, of a membership of but fifteen, which has done no work for more than four years, draws so greatly in advance of its payments, that each member of it taxes the Grand Lodge $1.37 a year.

"There are at least seven more of these lodges which have conferred no degrees for over three years, and many of them draw from the treasury of the Grand Lodge sums so greatly in excess of the dues which they pay, that the aggregate membership of these seven lodges must burden this body at the rate of nearly $1 a member. One lodge is kept in existence at an annual expense of $1.77 per member."

The treasurer's report showed that the Grand Lodge is rich enough to carry the burden of these dormant lodges for some time to come. Last year there was a balance on hand of $34,703.89; this year there is remaining in the treasury $36,379.67. Of the expenses the meeting of the Grand Lodge itself is the greatest, footing up to $17,944, other expenses, $11,126. The Grand Lodge is spending much breath in resolutions over a contemplated Masonic Orphan's Home. The fund for this enterprise is to be made up by individual Masons. But though two years have past the fund gains little, and enthusiasm languishes. Well it might when $36,000 is accumulated in the Grand Lodge treasury which would easily erect the building. This talk of an asylum is only forced upon the order as a measure of self-vindication. It must prove that its boasting is not in vain. But if really a charitable or benevolent society it would long since in every State and city have had some memorial of its work. There are a thousand proofs that it is not slow to proclaim its gifts to the unfortunate—who are its sworn members. It should be stated that a large number of Masons are in favor of less frequent meetings of the Grand Lodge. The public has not their reasons, but may surmise them. They voted strongly for this retrenchment and for discontinuing the schools for instruction in the initiation ritual.

OTHER MEETINGS.

During the same days when the above meeting was held the Grand Chapter of the Eastern Star, or women's Masonry, was held in another hall. There are about 2,500 women in Illinois engaged in this debasing business, but only 35 lodges were represented. On the first evening of the meeting, a lodge hall on Kinzie street was used, and the women went through the work of one or more degrees in the presence of the members of the Grand Lodge of men Masons, and all joined in a banquet to close.

The annual meetings of the Knight Templar, Royal Arch and "Royal and Selected Masters" were held in Chicago, in October. Little of interest was given to the public press of their business. The K. T. Grand Commander regretted that many subordinate bodies had failed to show much interest in the lodge business, and few had been initiated.

The Royal Arch Treasury is overflowing, there being a surplus of $17,000. The expenses were $11,000, and there are 11,816 Masons in Illinois who have taken this degree.

—Prof. A. J. Schem, one of the chief authorities on statistics, has published the following computation. He reports the population of the world at 1,396,752,000 souls; of whom 685,459,411 are under the Christian governments, and 711,383,589 under non-Christian governments. The total area of the earth he reckons to be 52,092,470 square miles; of which 32,419,915 square miles are under Christian governments, and 19,942,555 square miles are under non-Christian governments. It is only about eighty years since the Christian church began to endeavor in earnest to win the world to Christ, and so great has been the success that already nearly half of the population of the world is under Christian influences. The superior vitality and power of Christian governments is shown in the fact that nearly two-thirds of the area of the earth is under their sway. The sure promise of God is, Dan. 7, 27: "And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him."

—Mr. Mangassarian, an eccentric Armenian preacher, has for some time been preaching to a Presbyterian church in Philadelphia, but has lately renounced Presbyterianism, and after the manner of such radical liberalists as Prof. Swing of Chicago, he has organized a creedless church. On a recent evening he met about two hundred of his old congregation and organized a new church. He submitted the draft of a covenant to be signed by those who desire to become members. This remarkable document, which furnishes its own commentary, reads as follows:

"We, whose names are hereto subscribed, associate ourselves together as a Christian church for the purpose of moral and spiritual improvement and of promoting truth and righteousness in the world, through the study, practice and diffusion of pure religion, as taught and lived by Jesus Christ, love to God and love to man.

"Recognizing the right of private judgment and the sacredness of individual conviction, we require no assent to any other doctrinal statement as a basis of Christian fellowship, but welcome all who desire to co-operate with us in advancing the kingdom of God."

"All that is required of any one who desires to join our church," said Mr. Mangassarian, "is that he shall sign that covenant. When he does so he is a member."

—Dr. Storrs, of Brooklyn, thinks it is no part of a minister's business to manage the finances of his church, and so he charged Rev. W. F. Price, the new pastor of the Madison Avenue Congregational church.

—The centennial of the Moravian Seminary for Young Ladies, at Bethlehem, Pa., organized October 2d, 1785, but originally founded January 5th, 1749, was enthusiastically celebrated by its pupils, alumnæ and friends. Bishop de Schweinitz stated that the school had educated more than 7,000 young ladies, and ascribed the cause of its success to its threefold golden cord, which is, to raise the mind, the character, and the soul to the highest type of womanhood.

—The Board of Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal church, in session last week in New York, approved the appeal of the Freedman's Aid Society for $250,000 a year for Christian education in the Southern States among both white and colored people.

In the old country boycotting may yet prove a great blessing. Mr. Michael Davitt is in favor of this measure in relation to liquor and tobacco, as one of the most effectual ways of reducing the revenue of the English Government; and Mr. Bogg, another Irish radical, calls upon his countrymen "to shake off the English yoke," by having nothing to do with whisky or porter, tobacco or shoddy. This is a sort of boycotting to be commended, and, if generally adopted, would work a grand social and political revolution in Great Britain. As the Irish Christian Advocate says: "A country that with all its poverty expends in ten years nearly a hundred and twenty-eight millions sterling in spirits and beer alone, could be greatly benefitted by a course of abstinence from drink, and if tobacco were included in the pledge the result would be nothing short of prodigious."—Baptist Weekly.

REFORM NEWS.

THE WISCONSIN STATE CONVENTION will meet in the Town Hall, Waukeska, Tuesday evening, Nov. 17, and continue through Wednesday evening. Among the speakers announced are President C. A. Blanchard, of Wheaton, J. W. Wood, of Baraboo, and Rev. Isaac Bancroft, State Agent. Revs. Isaiah Faris and W W. Ames will also be present to assist. It is necessary that the Wisconsin brethren attend this meeting as largely as possible. Bro. Bancroft has been urging that some assistance be given him, and an earnest co-operation on the part of all the friends in the State is their just due to the State Agent whose devotion to reform and willing self-denial are a record of which Wisconsin may be proud. Let the attendance at Waukesha prove that he will be sustained by sympathy and aid from all parts of the State.

"IF," AND "PROVIDED."

If those friends of our reform in Wisconsin to whom circulars were sent would all respond as liberally as the thirteen did who did respond to the call for funds to support an organizing agent in the State, there would be enough to pay $200 per month, provided some Bro. Bancroft would add $10 per month to the amount paid by every thirteen donors of the 190 to whom circulars were sent. Only thirteen have responded with pledges and money enough, with Bro. B.'s $10 added, to make about $15 per month. One week yet remains before the meeting at Waukesha. Let all send a good contribution forthwith to my address here or to Waukesha, Nov. 17th. Money or pledges for the year to come—who will respond? W. W. AMES.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

NINTH ANNUAL MEETING OF THE STATE CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

The ninth annual meeting of the New Hampshire Christian Association was held in East Rochester, Oct. 27th to 29th. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, Elder Isaac Hyatt, Gilford Village. Secretary, S. C. Kimball, New Market. Treasurer, George Crosby, Gilford Village. County Vice Presidents: Belknap, Elder J. G. Smith; Carroll, B. M. Mason, Esq.; Cheshire, Dea. F. S. Wood; Grafton, Prof. J. K. Lord; Hillsboro, Rev. S. L. Jerould; Merrimack, J. F. French; Rockingham, Rev. E. C. Cogswell; Strafford, Dea. Moses Pierce; Sullivan, C. W. J. Fletcher; Coos, Elder T. L. Lang.

Executive Committee: Isaac Hyatt, S. C. Kimball, Geo. Crosby, Dea. S. Rowe, Dea. E. Smith.

The following is a summary of the resolutions adopted:

1. That Elder S. C. Kimball be continued as Home Missionary and State Agent.

2. That we discountenance all secret societies and warn Christian people to keep entirely aloof from them.

3. That we heartily commend the work of the N. H. Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and pledge our earnest co-operation.

4. That we advise all Christian churches to use unfermented wine at the Lord's Supper.

Also a resolution of sympathy for Elder R. N. Countee of Memphis, Tenn. Eight dollars were contributed for his relief.

The opening sermon by Elder J. G. Smith was a very able presentation of the several reform agencies now at work fulfilling the prophetic Scriptures and preparing the Bride of Christ for his promised return. Sister C. W. Bixley, of North Weare, presented the greetings of the N. H. W. C. T. U. Dea. S. Rowe of Gilford Village, Dea. E. Smith of Strafford, and Dea. Moses Pierce of Barrington, explained the duty of the church towards moral reformers. Dea. Rowe said it was a disgrace to the church to be the fag-end of a great reform. The Lord's people should be in the forefront of every great moral conflict. Elder Enoch Morrill of Rochester proved from the Bible the oneness of Christ's church.

Elder H. F. Wood of Dover gave an illustrated temperance lecture, both interesting and instructive. Sister Anna E. Smith of New York, missionary and evangelist, presented the Bible doctrine of physical healing by Jesus Christ. Nine persons testified to having experienced healing in answer to prayer. They were Mrs. Anna E. Smith of New York, Mrs. A. A. P. Caverly of Strafford, Ansel B. Sawyer of Gilford Village, Elder Isaac Jackson and wife of Harrison, Me., Mrs. Caroline Bixby of North Weare, Mrs. Ednah Shaw Kimball of New Market, Elder S. C. Kimball of New Market, and Elder Enoch Morril of Rochester. Elder John C. Shorey, who has been wonderfully healed by the Lord, was also present. The cases of healing were similar to those recorded in the Bible, and were nearly all overwhelmingly proved by present witnesses. Sister Bixby was healed during the service.

Wednesday evening I lectured on secret societies, showing their character and relation to the church. Thursday evening Elder H. L. Hastings lectured on infidelity. It was the most powerful defense of the Gospel to which I ever listened.

The attendance from abroad was larger than at any former annual meeting. We take this opportunity to express our thanks to the Advent brethren for the use of their house of worship, and for their generous, abundant and cordial hospitality; also to other friends who entertained our delegates, and to the Free Baptist Society for the use of their larger house for our last evening meeting. Let it be no longer thought necessary to say of our meetings that the order was perfect. The presence of the Lord was powerfully manifested from first to last. It was the most successful annual convention we have ever held.

Want of space forbids me to mention the many good things said and done. Anti-secrecy was powerfully presented at nearly every session, and I think much more effectively, being in company with all the leading reforms that agitate the public mind. Measures were set on foot to keep a State missionary in the field the whole year, or nearly so. Steps were also taken to organize a N. H. Woman's Christian Association auxiliary to the N. H. C. A. The Christian Cynosure, Christian Witness, and The Christian were commended to public favor. This report gives but a faint idea of the remarkable advance during the past year of our three distinctive principles, anti-secrecy, scriptural holiness, and faith healing. No words can describe the added impulse given to our reform work since so many of our leading workers have experienced the healings of their bodies and enduement of power from on high. It is scarcely necessary to add that not only souls and bodies are laid on the altar, but our stewardship in property is recognized. No words can express our gratitude to God for his presence, guidance and help. S. C. Kimball, Secretary N. H. C. A.

OHIO.

THE LINES CONVERGING ON COLUMBUS.

Columbus, Nov. 5.

Dear Cynosure:—Once more I pause to chronicle the events of the week, which are by no means few. The weather in this section has been quite unsettled. Rain and sunshine have followed each other in quick succession. The evenings have generally been quite dark. Notwithstanding the changes in the material world, our work has moved steadily on. On last Friday and Saturday evenings I had the pleasure of addressing fair audiences in the United Presbyterian church in Reynoldsburg. The following named gentlemen were here appointed as delegates to the State convention: W. W. Johnston, J. G. Graham, James Olden, Robert Boyd, D. L. Graham, and A. P. Henderson. It was voted that this delegation be impowered to add to their number as many as they should see fit. We shall expect a strong delegation from that place. I feel greatly indebted to brethren Johnston, Graham, Boyd, and others for their encouragement and assistance.

Bro. Johnston kindly hitched up his horse and took me through the rain to Bro. Hizey's on Sabbath morning, a distance of some four miles. I supposed arrangements had been made for me to speak in that neighborhood. But found some of the trustees of the church (United Brethren) objected. Peter Houser, a trustee, the oldest member in this church, and one who has given more than any other member, I am told, toward its support, expected to have made proper arrangements. He naturally does not like to have the truth shut out in this way, and will arrange for a lecture at some future time. Brethren Hizey and Houser subscribed for the Cynosure, and will attend the State convention with as many more as they can get to come.

My next stop was at the home of Rev. Mr. Bovey, Pataskała. He is reported as being one of the ablest clergymen in his section. He said, "Never in all my life have I seen the spirit of the lodge manifested as of late." Bro. McDaniel, of this place, is a presiding elder in the United Brethren church. He will help our convention in every way that he can. Bro. Bovey took me in his carriage to Bro. J. M. Scott's, a distance of some seven miles. Bro. Scott is one of those live men, who always make things move. Some say he is a crank. We saw his prohibition bills sticking to the sign boards and fences for miles before reaching his home. Rev. Teter, pastor of the Wesleyan church here, welcomed us to his church, where I spoke to a good audience, considering the night, on Tuesday evening. At the close of the lecture the following gentlemen were named delegates, with the same power as those at Reynoldsburg: Rev. Geo. Richey, Rev. J. H. Teter, J. M. Scott, Edward Eggleston, G. E. Thompson, and Luther Richey. Rev. Geo. Richey was not able to attend our meeting on account of poor health. We hope the Lord will restore his health, and that he may labor in this cause as he has in other days.

On Wednesday morning six of us Anti-masons started in Bro. Scott's light wagon for Newark. When we got about half way one of the springs gave out. If we had not been a temperance crowd, folks might have thought there was something wrong. At Newark Rev. J. Zartman, a reformer of the old stamp, subscribed for the Cynosure, and will see what arrangements can be made for lectures in his church.

Returning to Columbus I found several letters calling for lectures. This begins to look like business. Don't wait for me to come to your towns, friends, but get your delegates appointed for the State meeting, and report their names to me. Remember the time is short. I start for Xenia on the morning train. From here I shall go to Dayton, where Bro. John Rasor, of Janetown, Montgomery county, is to meet me and take me to his home. He writes, "The friends here give you a cordial invitation. Come prepared to stay a week." The Masons say they have friends when traveling. If they can find any better friends than I find, or any more of them, they are welcome. W. B. Stoddard.

KANSAS.

WORK ENOUGH TO DO.

Dear Editor:—On the 13th ult. I went to the Reformed Presbyterian Presbytery, which met at the Hebron church, ten miles southwest of Clay Center. I was warmly welcomed by them as a visitor and the Kansas State agent, and was kindly permitted to speak to them, nearly one hour, principally on the religion of Freemasonry, showing it to be the legitimate descendent or offspring of "Baal," "Tammuz," or ancient sun worship: as Mackey says, in "Symbolism of Freemasonry," pp. 27, 28: "Many, indeed all of the Masonic symbols of the present day, can only be thoroughly comprehended, and properly appreciated by this reference to sun worship."

The Presbytery passed a resolution of hearty sympathy with the anti-secrecy reform work, and promised material help when I should visit their fields of labor. I received five new subscribers for the Cynosure for the year, sold some books, and distributed tracts.

It is very pleasant and cheering to me to meet with fellow-soldiers in the Master's service, who will not blanch, or falter in the presence of the prophets of Baal; such as Rev. J. Dodds, with whom I became acquainted, and associated in the anti-secrecy reform work at Winchester, Kansas, first at a State Convention, and then in a public discussion with two prominent Masons of Leavenworth city in which I assisted him. Again it was a feast of good things, to hear the Rev. Dr. McClurkin preach from Haggai 2: 4.

From the Presbytery I started to go to a ministerial association of the East Nebraska Conference of the United Brethren church, Oct. 20th, but while I proposed, the Lord disposed otherwise. I got to Bro. J. Livingstone's Saturday evening, found the Free Will Baptists holding a meeting at the schoolhouse, but intending to close after the 11 o'clock service the next day, and I could have the Sabbath evening. But it rained all day so there was no meeting; and the roads were so muddy I did not go to the association, but circulated appointments to lecture Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday evenings. Had a fair attendance the first evening and an increased attendance each succeeding evening. Rev. P. O. Hutton made some very appropriate remarks after the close of the lectures. He is the pastor of the Mill-creek circuit United Brethren church. He and his charge will stand firm on the original and anti-secrecy principle of the church.

I now have twelve appointments, commencing tomorrow evening, with only two rest days; nine at five school-houses, and three in the Presbyterian church in Clyde, in Cloud county.

There are openings on every hand, and I anticipate interesting times. A sister who subscribed for the Cynosure, at the Presbytery, noticed above, told me of a young man who belonged to the Masons and unfortunately got a leg broken, and lay for eight weeks at her house. During the whole time he received but one visit from his "brother" Masons. When he got so he could go on his crutches, he visited the lodge expecting to get some of the boasted charity to help pay his doctor's bill, and expenses. But they had none for him, and he left the lodge intending never to return. R. Loggan.

CORRESPONDENCE.

AN IMPORTANT SUGGESTION.

Dear Cynosure:—In view of the multiplied brutal assaults perpetrated by the "Secret Empire" upon the peaceful, godly citizens of our free (?) land, I propose a tract which shall group together in convenient form the leading outrages known to the public since the days of Morgan. Or perhaps the tract should begin with the bloody record from the time of the revival of lodgery in this country.

Let the facts be thrown together for the use of lecturers and information of the people. There are enough of these fiendish attacks, since that cowardly one on D. P. Rathbun, to make a large and soul-stirring tract that must convince all decent, candid people that the lodge is no friend to freedom anywhere. By such a presentation of the facts, known and read of all men, let the patriot blood be stirred till he that can run can see that the lodge is poisonous to state and church.

Just as I had written the foregoing lines, and paused to do some chores, another letter came to me from Bro. Countee, dictated by him, he not being able to write on account of gun-shot wounds received on Sabbath evening, October 18th, on his way home from church. This is the second brutal attack upon this godly man by lodge assassins; and now the usual fiendish threats are posted against this brother and any who may be good and brave enough to sympathize with him in his afflictions, and seek his protection. Is not this the established record of the secret empire? How benevolent, how patriotic, how religious! Do we not need these brave knights (midnight assassins) to defend the Christian faith? How do they defend Christians in Memphis? Just as they will anywhere, if they get the power.

By the time the proposed tract it compiled, you will probably have more lodge outrages if not more martyrs to put on record. This tract is made necessary by the cowardly silence of both the secular and religious press. If the newspapers would become the impartial organs of the news, scores and hundreds of revolting facts, of purely Masonic outrages, would go to the people, which are ignored and covered up by a time-serving, and truckling press. Though our persecuted Brother Countee, of Memphis, Tenn., is one of the prominent Baptists of the South, I presume, judging from the past, that our leading Baptists, North if not South, will ignore the repeated fiendish attempts to take his life. If not I shall be pleasantly surprised.

While a thousand events of far less importance to our Zion and to our Republic are blazed abroad, our religious presses are silent as the sepulchre on any event that would be likely to reflect dishonor to the lodge. Should they expose the Satanic spirit of the "order" they would probably cut off lodge ears and names from their lists. Shame on a time-serving press and ministry. Yours for the truth,

Nathan Callender.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT FROM BRO. MATHEWS.

Spring Arbor, Mich., Nov. 3, 1885.

Cynosure Friends:—To expedite matters, I send this open letter, which is an acknowledgment, with gratitude, for the following sums sent me by W. I. Phillips, treasurer of N. C. A:

C. A. Blanchard, Wheaton,	$10.00
Rufus Stratton, Chicago,	5.00
J. S. Hickman, Goodwine, Ill.,	5.00
Ansel Lake, Graywillow, Ill.,	3.00
A Friend, Sabetha, Kans.,	3.00
Elder J. L. Barlow, Wheaton, Ill.,	1.00
John Gardner, Aurora, Ill.,	1.00
Conrad Stegner, Northfield, Minn.,	1.00
Total,	$29.00

To be added to this cash donation, is an account I owed the N. C. A. of $8.95, which by vote of the directors is canceled; so making in all $37.95.

Thank you, brethren; you can hardly realize what a load it has lifted off my heart. I noticed in the Cynosure of October 29th, mention made of Father Catterlin, of Abilene, Kans., and of his remembering me with $5. Let me say it was $25 that I reported. Please correct so that every man may get his due. Yours for truth, Ed. Mathews.

A WARM HEART FOR THE REFORM.

GALVESTON, Texas, Oct. 31st, 1885.

DEAR EDITOR:—I am a foreigner (Swede), having been here in America but a little over five years, yet I desire to inform you, my dear brother, that your work is God s and mine. I detest, yea, abhor and hate all secret societies; they are performing the works of darkness of which the Lord says, "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reproving them." I am, through the grace of God, striving to do that. I can better speak than write, therefore I am speaking loudly against them, both in public and in private, and how can I do otherwise. I regard it as a pleasant duty to bring in my testimony against such an evil which threatens to overthrow that which is dear to us. Secret societies are striking at the very root of our national, municipal and religious government, and in its stead erects altars for Baal. I lament and weep when I remember how many ministers of the cross of Christ are in their firm grip, chained and doomed. They are not bound in chains for the Gospel of Christ, but because of carnal lusts. O, that the God of all grace would permit his Son Jesus Christ to be revealed to those ministers. Remember, dear brother, that no sanctified person ever was a Mason[?], nor ever can be, because of innumerable reasons.

I speak against those societies from a deep-felt necessity and from a burning soul desire, "God being my helper." I love freedom based upon a foundation of truth and real love, not on pretentions and humbug. I am in heart and soul fully sympathizing with you and your noble work—tearing down the altars and strongholds of Moloch, erecting the altar of the God of love. Wishing and praying for God's and your success, I remain yours in Jesus,

P. A. JUHLIN.

WHAT WOULD BECOME OF THE WORLD WITHOUT REFORMERS.

MARYVILLE, Mo.

To the Reformers of America:—In the fierce conflict all along every reform line, I have only time to give you one word of cheer. It is a thought that should dwell richly in all our hearts. But few realize the great importance of the natnre, influence, and result of all true reform work. There can be no doubt that long before our day,—had there been no reformers, our world would have gone down. Hence how this thought must cheer, and greatly comfort all God's reformers in these last days, as they learn by investigation their vital relationship to our fallen world. Let us all come to the front, and stand nnited, with the happy thought reigning in our minds, that we can afford to endure abuse that we may, by any means, save some of the many on their way to death and hell; to save the so-called church from all kinds of divisions and corruptions; the nation from all secret, and rnm powers; and the family to its true relationships to God, and that our good God, and his Holy Word, may not only be respected, but duly esteemed, in the family, church, and nation, yours till the work is faithfully done.

KILLING OFF LODGEMEN.

RICHLAND, Iowa, Nov. 2, 1885.

A sad tragedy has just been enacted in our town. On last Thursday evening two of our citizens, Dr. G. T. Barto, a resident of the city, and Mr. David Duke, a farmer living three miles out, met in Mr. Goodwin's store, and had hard words regarding post-office troubles. Barto asked Duke to come out and they would settle it. After some delay Duke went out, keeping his hand in his pocket. When outside the store, Barto struck at Duke. Duke drew his revolver and commenced firing. Barto also took out his weapon and began shooting, Duke having in the meantime fired two or three shots. He soon emptied his revolver, when the firing ceased. Barto said to his son, who had just come up, "He has killed me." He walked some distance, was put in a carriage and taken home; and upon examination his injuries were found to be fatal. He died the day following, and the funeral services took place on Sabbath morning. He being a member of the Masons, Odd-fellows and also of the Grand Army, the orders were all out in full regalia, the latter leading off in the ceremonies. Duke was taken in charge, and lodged in jail. He is said to be a Royal Arch Mason, so it may be a matter of some interest to keep an eye on this case in the future. A.

PITH AND POINT.

EFFECT OF AN ARTICLE ON THE G. A. R.

Since the publicatiou of that article there has been a bitter opposition to me personally in the little villiage where I live. The lodge has twice published a request to retract. The spirit manifested in their whole proceedings against me, has confirmed me that they are determined to hem in my civil liberty, and if this is done in one case, why not in another? Their religious character and moral tendencies I shall be able to bring out more fully now. We have uo late publication of the ritual, and why do we need such an exposition? Are they not demonstrating all the while that they are just what the old ritual shows them to be? God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, bless every effort put forth against wickedness in high places!—D. S., Prospect, O,

RECOLLECTIONS OF A VETERAN.

I must tell you that I am one of the old "Anti masons" of 1832, from near Rochester, N. Y., with family relatives at Batavia, (where I visited the monument erected to the memory of Capt. Wm. Morgan, and attended the burial of a second cousin in the same cemetry, on the day of my visit there two years since); in fact I know all about the Morgan capture, and trip to Canandaigua, and on Old Ridge Road to Fort Niagara, and drowning in Niagara river: was well acquainted with Thurlow Weed, editor of the first Anti-masonic paper in Rochester. Though but a boy at that time, I attended the mock lodges in our town with my father, Hon. Geo. Brown, who was an intimate friend of Thurlow Weed, and used to invite him to our house to dine; so I became a strong Anti-mason—as I was also able to read Weed's paper, and attend political Anti masonic meetings. That the Masons captured and drowned Wm. Morgon, there is no doubt in my mind, as I have crrefully examined the evidence, and was right on the ground at the time.—J. T. BROWN, M. D., Kearney, Neb.

Dr. Brown must write more fully of his recollections. All such testimony is of great value, and year by year the number of those who can give it is becoming sadly less.

MEMORIAL-DAY SERMON.

I think there was at least one exception to Bro. Hinman's estimate of the character or drift of the memorial sermons on, or about, the 30th of May last. An Episcopal clergyman spoke in this place somewhat in the following strain: "The use the people make of moral freedom, determines the question of the life or death of the nation. If they practice good morals, and govern themselves by the higher law, they will so perform the duties devolving upon them, that the nation shall be prosperous and permanent; but if an opposite course be pursued, the lovers of vice becoming the majority and obtaining the supremacy, ruin and death of the nation will result."—R. STUDIES IN THE KINGS AND PROPHETS.

LESSON VIII. Nov. 22, 1885.—Hezekiah's good reign. 2 Kings 18: 1–12.

GOLDEN TEXT.—He did that which was right in the sight of the Lord. 2 Kings 18: 3.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

COMMENTS ON THE LESSON BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. The characteristics of a righteous ruler. vs. 1–6. Hezekiah is given a just prominence in sacred history. Next to David, he was the noblest and best of the Jewish kings; his life affords singularly fine illustrations of God's dealing with his true children; while his character is a profitable study for its combination of those qualities which make a righteous and successful ruler. His reign was what it was because of the fact so simply recorded in v. 3: "He did that which was right in the sight of the Lord." He did not pay his court to Expediency, that brazen-faced idol so worshiped by the rulers and legislators of to day. He did not take human counsel when about the great work of destroying idolatry. He did not say, as so many do in reference to the lodge, the dram-shop and other great evils. "We must 'make haste slowly' in this reform business, and wait till the people are educated up to it. Better leave at least a few of the high places standing, for if we go too fast there is danger of revolt and possibly of revolution, and we shall lose all the advantage we have gained." No such weak temporizing with Hezekiah. There had been kings before him who had instituted partial reforms, but they always stopped half way, seeming to fear radical measures for probably the same reason that many good men fear them now. They have not faith enough to do as Hezekiah did—do right and calmly leave the results to God. He was a true Christian iconoclast, striking down everything which stood in the way of a pure worship. Even the brazen serpent with all its sacred associations he boldly destroys, and in sarcastic rebuke of the superstitious reverence paid it by the people calls it Nehushtan, a piece of brass. The root of his courage was trust in God, the basis of that trust, conscious integrity. His life was consistent with his role as a reformer. "He clave unto the Lord and departed not from following him."

2. National prosperity and righteous rulers closely connected. vs. 7–12. Hezekiah prospers whithersoever he goes, and achieves national independence for his country while the neighboring kingdom of Samaria falls helplessly beneath the Assyrian yoke, her long successions of wicked kings having at last filled up the cup of her iniquity. The execrable doctrine that the private life of a man has nothing to do with his fitness for office should be frowned upon and as far as possible voted down by every Christian patriot. To elect a man of doubtful morals or irreligious life to the Executive chair is the same thing as for the nation to write itself practically Godless. It is to tear down the very foundation of law, and open the way for license and anarchy to do their ruinous work.

LIGHT FROM THE WORD.

What kind of rulers should we always elect? Ex. 18: 21. How did one wicked king, after he was himself dead, bring destruction on the whole Jewish nation? Ki. 24: 3, 4. What should rulers be? Ex. 18:19. m. c. Ro. 13: 4. f. c.

"Hezekiah (strength of Jehovah) the son of Ahaz king of Judah. Hezekiah was the thirteenth king of Judah, and one of the best. He had a prosperous reign of 29 years (B. C. 726–698). He was the good son of a bad father. (1) Perhaps a good mother, the daughter of a prophet, counteracted the evil example of his father. (2) Perhaps also the excessive evil of his father and the results of his wickedness proved a warning to the son. (3) Isaiah the prophet, who began to prophecy in his father's reign, may have exerted a good influence over him. The Jewish rabbis say he was his tutor. But (4) even if these things exerted their influence, we must, with Lange, "recognize here, if anywhere, a dispensation of divine Providence."—Peloubet. He was one of the noblest princes who ever adorned David's throne. His reign of 29 years offers an almost unmarred picture of persevering warfare against the most intricate and most difficult circumstances, and of glorious victory. He was very noble, not unwarlike or wanting in courage (2 Kings 20: 20), yet by choice more devoted to the arts of peace (2 Chron. 32: 27–29; Prov. 25: 1).—Ewald.

The condition of Judah when Hezekiah ascended the throne was sad in the extreme. The political situation was humiliating. The kingdom had been invaded by the Edomites and many people carried away captives. The king of Assyria distressed the kingdom, and the temple and the palace were robbed of their treasures to buy him off. And the kingdom was expected to pay a large annual tribute to Assyria. Ahaz, with a daring impiety, had closed the temple altogether, broke up its sacred vessels, altered or removed part of its costly furniture, and marked his full adoption of polytheistic worship by setting up altars "in every corner of Jerusalem," as well as throughout the land. The Jews still commemorate by a yearly fast this time of affliction.—Green.

"Images." These were, no doubt, originally memorial pillars or stones erected to commemorate some divine manifestation, and with no thought of idolatry (see Gen. 31: 13; 35: 14, 20; 28: 18). But the Canaanites erected pillars, which were also statues or images, to their god Baal in the same places, or used the old pillars for Baal worship.

"Groves." These were wooden pillars to Ashtoreth, as the images were stone pillars to Baal. Some of them may have been effigies of that goddess, and all were consecrated to her impure and revolting worship.

"And he called it Nehushtan." Rather, "And it was called Nehushtan." This was its popular name down to the time of its destruction. The people called it, not the serpent (nahash), but the brass, or the brass thing (nehushtan). Probably they did not like to call it the serpent on account of the dark associations which were attached to that reptile (Gen. 3: 1–15; Isaiah 27: 1; Ps. 91: 13, etc.).—Cook.

"To the fenced city." The reign of Hezekiah is the culminating point of interest in the history of the kings of Judah. He gives the first distinct example of an attempt to collect the sacred books of his country. By his orders a large part (Prov. 25: 1) of the Proverbs of Solomon—to which Jewish tradition adds the prophesies of Isaiah, the book of Ecclesiastes, and the Canticles—were written out and preserved. The palace at Jerusalem was a storehouse of gold, silver and jewels; the porch of the palace was once more hung with splendid shields (2 Chr. 32: 27). The towers and enclosures sprang up for the vast herds and flocks of the pastoral districts. The vineyards, olive-yards, and cornfields were again cultivated. The towers and fortifications of Jerusalem, the supply of water to the town, both by aqueduct from without, and by a reservoir hewn out of the solid rock, were for centuries connected with his name. "Peace and truth" were the watchwards of his reign.—Stanley.

The Law and Order League of Cincinnati is a society having some vitality and force. It has begnn an effort to close the theatre on the Lord's day. First, notices were sent to all the managers, which were disregarded. Then four offenders were arrested, who pleaded guilty and were fined. The effect has been salutory, as the managers say they will be glad to close if the law is uniformly enforced.

LODGE NOTES.

—The American Legion of Honor was organized about September, 1879. It now has 1,050 councils and 57,005 members, and has paid to the widows and orphans of deceased companions $4,556,676.21. Five thousand dollars is the highest amount paid by this order on the death of a member.

—Grand Master Speed holds that belief in the existence of God and the immortality of the soul qualifies one for Masonry, that it is a mistake to suppose that the Masonic institution is founded upon the Bible. As a symbol Masonry regards it with the greatest veneration, but there are lodges in which it is not to be found at all, the Koran or the Vedas being substituted.—Toronto Mail.

—The Detroit Post tells of a new order, the "Knights of St. John and Malta," which, it says, is in no way connected with or substituted for the old society known as the "Sons of Malta," which created no end of amusement a few years ago. It is a beneficial organization for the purpose of securing a payment of $5 to $7 per week in case of sickness, and also an endowment of $1,000 or $2,000, as the case may be, payable at the death of a member to his family. It is an unsectarian secret association and contains several degrees or orders, each of which has a symbolical meaning and reference. Like all quasi military organizations they have a distinctive and highly picturesque uniform and are exercised in a drill peculiar to themselves. There are numerous encampments in the United States, Canada, England and on the continent of Europe.

—A Mason, in the Inter Ocean some time since, wrote that the French Masons had introduced a novelty—the initiation of women into the lodge. The writer thinks the French are thus making themselves ridiculous "in the eyes of all right-thinking men. We can hardly conceive anything more outrageous, we might say, indecent. However, Masons have nothing to do with Le Grand Orient and its atheistical adherents, so we need not trouble ourselves about the matter."

—It was not until July 1, 1882, that the Odd-fellow lodges were obliged, in obedience to a decree of their Supreme lodge, to transact all business in the third degree, or degree of truth. This change was not made without some opposition on account of the expense, some previous legislation having imposed the expense of half a million dollars on the order.

AMERICAN PLATFORM.

ADOPTED AT CHICAGO, JUNE 20, 1884.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled condition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clannishness by which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile bands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruption, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; and having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and believing the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, both inevitable and indispensable:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, believing with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; believing in the Christian marriage, and not in Mormonism; believing in the religious democracy of the New Testament, and not in the despotism of the lodge; believing, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, not in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we abhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscience by human laws and penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly believe that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike foes to human liberty and welfare. We further most firmly believe that a government without God has none but lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a mere usurpation, we regard all religions and worships invented by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as mere swindling impositions and cheats. We believe in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly believe that the bravery and blood of our soldiers have bought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will be just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised by the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon be not only echoed by their voices, but sustained by their votes.

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following, as containing a brief synopsis of the principles of our government, by which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.
2. That the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.
3. That God requires, and man needs a Sabbath.
4. We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.
5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.
6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to benefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.
7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punishment of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.
8. We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage.
9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be preserved inviolate, and the same equality should be extended to Indians and Chinamen.
10. That international differences should be settled by arbitration.
11. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.
12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.
13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.
14. That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.
15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

The Christian Cynosure.

EDITORS.

J. BLANCHARD. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1885.

ANTI-SECTARIAN.—Dr. Hopkins, President of Williams College, and of the American Board, in his late address to that body, said: "What Christians need is loyalty to Christ and direct responsibility to him. Let all Christians have this, and they would be united to each other. Their narrowness, bigotry, jealousy and distinctive names would fall off of themselves. They would become simply Christians, as were the disciples at Antioch, and would move on with an unbroken front to the conquest of the world."

Hardly. No evil like sectarianism has been cast out of the church without a struggle.

GEN. MCCLELLAN'S DEATH received due official notice. The comments of the press, as a whole, are somewhat worse than silence. The Madison (Wis.) Daily Democrat excuses him because he "was intimidated" thus: "During the greater porton of his struggle the position of the Confederates was infinitely more faulty than that of the Union forces, and to explain why McClellan did not support Porter's corps at Mechanicsville, Beaver Dam Creek and Gaines Mill with his whole army, or throw the seventy thousand men on his left wing against the defenses of Richmond, all that can be said is that he wildly overestimated his opponent and was afraid. It was a time when he could have offered to have staked all upon the chance of success. Of course it was early in the war, and the very spirit of dash of the Confederates, intimidated the Union general." But many impute to him something worse than cowardice. An old and careful observer says, "McClellan's actions all pointed one way, and indicated that his mind was fixed on the hope of promotion at the end of the war."

MRS. GEN. BIRNEY'S BOOK.—We somewhile since noticed "The Grimke Sisters," a volume by Mrs. Catharine H. Birney, wife of Gen. Wm. Birney, son of the first Liberty candidate for President of the United States. The history in which men are most deficient, is that of the age immediately preceeding them. Mrs. Birney's book sheds an agreeable light over that period for us, and those who buy and read this book, will see how the United States shook and shuddered under the compound blow-pipe of slave labor and free. We are glad to learn that the press greets this volume handsomely, and we recur to it that none of our readers may miss the opportunity of reading it.

The Catholic Review, Oct. 31, says: "It is announced that the Pope is about to grant a Jubilee in honor of the Queen of the Rosary." Will this great church organ tell us who is "the Queen of the Rosary?" Where is her realm? Who are to join in the "Jubilee?" and for what?

The Irish correspondent of the Review thus speaks of the late Cardinal McCloskey's visit to Ireland: "Your correspondent had the honor of a pretty long interview with his Eminence at the residence of the late Cardinal Cullen on that occasion; the educational question, Catholic journalism, and kindred American topics being the chief subjects." Irish Roman Catholic priests meet a Cardinal in Ireland and the topic of chief interest is the overthrow of the Free School system in this country. Are these men successors of Peter and Paul? What are they doing for the illiterate and criminal masses of Romanists which run our saloons and fill our prisons?

> "That in the captain's but a choleric word,
> Which in the soldier is flat blasphemy."
> —Shakespere.

Some of our Southern correspondents write that Rev. Mr. Countee was rash in his speech, and treated those who opposed him with irritating language. Allowing this judgment to be true, it is a poor justification of attempted murder. While the Abolitionists were mobbed and murdered, the one standing charge against them was, "Violent and abusive language." And the changes were rung on this charge by men who never provoked opposition because they did nothing effective against the slave system. The presumption is, that when Rev. Mr. Countee spoke against the lodge, he was met with a volley of abuse, and may, in some cases, have answered "fools according to their folly." But neither Masons nor slave-holders care about harsh language. What enraged the latter was making slavery unpopular. So with the lodge. Rev. B. A. Imes is guarded and choice in his words, yet his life is threatened, and he is warned, in letters with black border, to leave the city of Memphis.

We are in receipt of letters concerning the proposed General Church Congress against the lodge. Hon. Halleck Floyd writes: "I have consulted my committee, and we recommend Dayton, Ohio, as the place, and next May as the time.

Dr. J. W. R. Sloane, professor in the Reformed Presbyterian Theological Seminary, endorses and will do all he can to render it a success.

Dr. David R. Ker, editor of the United Presbyterian, proffers the use of his large and influential paper to aid it.

Rev. H. Woodsmall, of Mississippi, is strong for it.

We give these glimpses that our readers may know that things are moving. We will give full details ere long. There are other important facts.

THE INTER OCEAN CATERING TO THE LODGES.

One of the most offensive pieces of writing which we often see, lately appeared in the Chicago Inter Ocean. This paper says: "The attraction of the lodge is not confined to locality;" nor is it "racial in its manifestations." We do not object to the word racial because manufactured by the editor, but because it conveys a glaring untruth. No black, or yellow, or half-yellow descendents from Africans can belong to Albert Pike Masonry. The colored people had to go across the ocean for their charters.

But the drift of the article is to draw men and money into the upper degrees of the various secret orders. The writer says:

> "The men who are to be proficient in these degrees have no boy's play before them. They are subjected to long, patient, thorough drills, under competent drill-masters and the result of this regular and persistant training is seen in the splendidly equipped and drilled men who are the pride of the drill-hall and armories, and who are greeted with unmistakably favorable notice when they pass down the streets, gay in their showy uniforms, with bright banners."

And he bids us to look to the "military degrees" in these lodges, for help "in case of war, and a sudden unlooked-for call for men to take arms.' These "military degrees" in the different lodges this editor specifies as: "in Masonry, Templarism; in Oddfellowship, the uniform degree, which it is now proposed to unite with the Patriarchal Circle; in Pythianism, the uniform rank; among the Ancient Order of United Workmen, their Select Knights, and so on."

Thus this Republican(?) Chicago daily seeks to swell these secret orders which are in sworn affiliation with the profligate princes of Europe, who gave their influence in our slavery war, to dismember this Republic,—orders, which are themselves of foreign birth and origin, whose constitution is despotism, and their religion blasphemy. If the Inter Ocean had spoken thus before the American lodges were turned inside out, before Seward had declared them "hostile to every government which they cannot control," before Daniel Webster had declared that "their oaths should be prohibited by law," and before two hundred and twenty-eight thousand votes had been given for Wirt in 1832, who likened the lodge to "the Spanish Inquisition," and the brigand "society of the Black Hand," the insult to our intelligence would have been less.

But right under the Inter Ocean's eyes, in Farwell Hall, Chicago, the Past Master of the Keystone lodge, has lately exemplified and exhibited the degrees of these lauded lodges; and showed them to be a detestable compound of human degradation and imposture; what, indeed, John Wesley called "a banter on the human race!"

We have been proud of the Chicago daily press, and of the Inter Ocean as a part of it, but we are perplexed and pained at this article under review. Does the editor suppose his readers ignorant of the writings of John Quincy Adams, of Richard Rush, and hundreds of noble Americans who declare and show the lodge to be in the words of young Fred Seward, "hostile to every American principle." Does this great American daily really mean to set aside, as sources of national defence, West Point, Anapolis, and the organized militia of the States, and direct our hopes of national security to a system of secret lodges, of which Confederate General Albert Pike is the "Sovereign Grand Commander," and acknowleged head!—a general who brought Cherokee and Choctaw Indians to Washington, initiated them in Masonry, and by their aid raised two regiments of them to fight and scalp our Union troops at Pea Ridge? We beg and hope the Inter Ocean will explain, and relieve the embarrassment of the large portion of its readers who know the facts and history of the American lodge.

In France, prior to the Reign of Terror, Europe, but especially the French part of it, was covered all over with secret sworn lodges, Christian, infidel and mixed. Adepts joined all these lodges, little and large; and, by adding degrees, as the the Inter Ocean tells us our American lodges are doing, tied them together at the top by running them together into a degree of ingenious savagery. The blindfolded candidate's hand was gloved, and laid, he was told, upon the beating heart of a brother or near friend of his, who had forfeited his life, and he was appointed to kill him. If he struck boldly the dagger into the heart whose throbs he could feel through his glove, he found he had killed a lamb, substituted for his brother; but he had proved his readiness to assassinate his bosom friend at the bidding of the lodge. He, being thus proved worthy, was admitted to the secrets of the Revolution, which made the rivers of France run thick with gore! These and like facts are given in a book published in New York in 1798, for the present of which Rev. Frederick Snyder received the thanks of Washington.

What assurance can the Inter Ocean editor give us, when he has joined the secret lodges together by additions at the top and put the whole dire system into the hands of such men as planned to burn down Chicago in the slavery war, leaving all the decent men below,—what assurance can this editor give us that the historic fate of France will not become ours? Do light and darkness, right and wrong change nature by continuance?

There are some thirty thousand Swedes and Norwegians, and multitudes besides, in Chicago, who know and believe the facts and ideas set forth in this writing to be true. May we not hope that the Hon. Philo Carpenter and his thousands of associaties may receive from the Inter Ocean the candor and courtesy of a reply; and that the great paper, if in error, will put itself right with the American people?

TO EDUCATE CHILDREN IN COLLEGE.

A multitude of parents having children to educate, have from the first, sold or exchanged property and removed into towns of American colleges, so as to board their children during college course. This is so eminently wise that no parents, probably, ever regretted it. For children during the combustible period of life, it is truth as well as poetry, that "There's no place like home." There is the father whose wrinkles smooth out when his children "do well;" there is the mother with a streak of flour on her apron, and a smile on her face when the children "come home." Ex-Gov. Washburn said the other day, "It is a universal and profoundly interesting fact, that fathers rejoice to be out done by their sons; and mothers feel proud that their daughters are having better advantages than they had when they were young." We have read of exceptions, where old mothers wish to be gay like the witch-hazel which blooms late in autumn; and some old sparks who have "Frisked beneath the burdens of fourscore;" but these are not Christians.

We are led to these reflections by the application of some citizens who wish to sell or exchange their property to remove to Dakota or elsewhere, and would give advantageous terms to parents wishing to bring their families to Wheaton, Ill. There is a neat house and barn, with two acres of good land, near our own residence, for sale cheap for cash. It is near the College, and near the depot, with sidewalk leading to both, and good neighbors, excepting, of course, ourselves. The Cynosure editor would not refuse to answer letters to persons wishing to purchase. But this article contains all we could say, and the best thing to do is come and "see for your selves."

One day two young men came to the College, one born in Greenland, the other by the coast-range on the Pacific. One is now a Danish government officer, and the other a lawyer in California. There is now in Wheaton College a nephew of a late governor of Honduras, Central America, and in any good college the ideas of the world contrive to cluster and blend, like the colors of the spectrum, in white light, and where thought is free, instruction thorough, discipline diligent and truth fearlessly spoken, there wants only the blessing of God to make a college like an illuminated ice palace in everything but its cold. A good student in such a college, and watched over by godly parents, may become brightness within brightness, like the angel of the apocalypse standing in the sun.

This article is written without fee or reward, and intended as a work of benevolence. But the property mentioned will be found all that it is set forth and more. And as the railway is to make almost a continuous village to the Mississippi, property in Wheaton will never be cheaper than now.

—The Hebrew Standard of New York published a while since a large part of Rev. B. T. Roberts' powerful tract on Masonry entitled, "A False Religion," and charges those who want to Christianize Masonry to please its enemies" with placing the lodge between two fires.

—Generals Chetlain and Logan will not feel themselves complimented when they read in the Birmingham, Iowa, Free Press of last week an illustrated description of their Masonic performance around on the corner of Halsted and Randolph streets from the Cynosure office.

—Bro. William F. Davis, of Chelsea, Mass., the missionary of the Michigan lumber regions and the associate with H. L. Hastings and Dr. Gordon in preaching on Boston Common, is visiting Block Island and finds the lodge setting its foot upon that summer retreat. He asks for literature to follow and confirm the testimony he has been giving lately.

—A local politician died in this city last week and was buried from the Roman Catholic cathedral in a Catholic cemetery. Yet the obsequies at the house were under the direction of a lodge of the "Independent Order of Foresters." The reason for this marked departure from the uniform practice of the Catholic church is not explained.

—The Grand Army of the Republic held a fair at La Fayette, Ind., last week which realized some $2,000. In response to this liberal patronage on the part of the public, the Grand Army voted to donate a cord of wood to each of the four widows of deceased comrades. This is lodge charity.

—A minister who has been enough inside the lodge to become impregnated with its philosophy in commenting on the Sabbath-school lesson, said of the sailors of Jonah's ship who called upon their various gods, that there was no such thing as false religions, but only false systems or false theories of religion. Religion itself is one, but men differ in their intelligence and instruction, and some get on the wrong track. But a religion implies a worship and an object of worship. If there is no false religion, there is no false worship or false god.

—The determination of Weaver, Shuey and Co. to break down the testimony of the United Brethren church, and make it more wealthy and popular with the world by bringing in the lodge, is already proving at what cost they will succeed. We hear of one and another, among the best men in the church, leaving for some other fold where duplicity and cunning are not yet the controlling influences. A letter from one of the best of the United Brethren ministers in Illinois just now tells us that he has left them, with sorrow, yet under a sense of duty, and is now pastor of a Congregational church in Hancock county, which is free from lodge fellowship and will hear the truth on this subject candidly. The commission secured by the Dayton managers to revise the United Brethren constitution and confession meets this week, and is to complete its work before January.

—Bro. H. R. Holsinger, of the Brethren church, and corresponding editor of the Progressive Christian, is now raising a fund to pay the debt of Ashland College, Ashland, Ohio. He called lately at the Cynosure office to renew an old acquaintance, and kindly notices our work in his paper, and gives his own people a warning note likewise: "I also visited the Cynosure office, and was favored with a copy for perusal. I used to get it in exchange as long as I was in the office, and was employed on the paper several months, while we lived in the city, so that its pages look very familiar to me. It is the leading anti-secrecy organ of the country, and is published by the National Christian Association. Our Brethren can read it with much profit to themselves and to the cause. We must guard vigilantly against the intrigues of Masonry and its pernicious influences, if we would have the church prosper. We fear too much has already been lost by indulgence. Our position upon all such questions should be clearly defined and faithfully administered. This is one of the unfruitful works of darkness, with which we should have no fellowship, but rather reprove them, 'for it is a shame even to speak of those things which are done of them in secret.' Eph. 5:11, 12."

PERSONAL MENTION.

—Mrs. J. S. Collins, an occasional contributor to the Cynosure, and wife of Dr. S. Collins, president of the national convention, has written a book which will soon be published by the United Presbyterian Publishing House at Pittsburgh.

—Rev. William Wishart, D. D., of Haysville, a reform "pillar" in Ohio, has been visiting Illinois. He preached recently for Dr. T. H. Hanna in the First U. P. church of Monmouth.

—The friends of our cause everywhere will grieve to learn of the recent death of Mrs. A. E. Jenks, of Cheshire, Mass., whose devotion to the name and honor of her Saviour led her to unusual and zealous labor to bring men out of the darkness of lodgery into Gospel light and freedom.

—Rev. B. F. Worrell, of Beloit, Kan., on a recent visit to his former home, at Olathe, was permitted to rejoice in knowing that his only unconverted child, the youngest, had accepted Christ.

—Dr. W. T. Meloy, of the United Presbyterian church in this city, has lately been visiting the scenes of his earlier ministry about Cadiz, in eastern Ohio.

—At the meeting of the U. P. Synod of Ohio, Oct. 20th, Dr. J. P. Lytle of Sago, O., delivered a "masterly" address on secret societies, reasoning that they are unnecessary, selfish, profane, anti-Christian, arbitrary and despotic.

—Mrs. L. H. Plumb, of Streator, is one of those rare and noble women who put the name of Christ first, and so are willingly identified with every reform movement which exalts him. She is well known among the friends of the N. C. A. for her activities and her gifts, and in the woman's temperance movement she is a leader as well as worker. On her return from the National W. C. T. U. at Philadelphia last Friday, she stopped over night with a daughter at Wheaton College. She was filled with the enthusiasm of the meeting, which she regarded as one of the most wonderful ever held by that body.

—The sixtieth anniversary of the marriage of Isaac J. Gilbert, our well-known reformer friend of Derby, Connecticut, was celebrated Monday, October 26th, at his home in Derby, on the banks of the Housatonic river, Connecticut. His wife was Miss Elizabeth Hyatt, who is two years his senior, he being eighty-one years of age. His children, grandchildren, and relatives, to the number of about fifty attended the anniversary. There were present also seven old people, whose aggregate ages amounted to 599 years. Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert have long been known as a couple who were models of conjugal happiness and confidence. The aged husband was in extremely good spirits, and laughed and told funny stories of old times with the joviality of a boy. After a banquet, Rev. John Pegg, a son-in-law, and pastor of the Methodist church at Port Chester, read an original poem. The couple were married in Ridgefield, by the Rev. Marvin Richardson, in 1825. The groom's brother, James, one year his senior, and his sister, Mrs. Daniel Lovejoy, aged seventy-nine, were present then, and also on the present occasion.

LITERATURE.

The advance sheets are received of a new book by Rev. Henry T. Cheever, of Worcester, Mass., entitled "Correspondences of Faith, and Views of Madame Guyon, including the study of faith as a mental discipline and its regal position of power and direction in the theology and church of the future." In the preface the author gives some glimpses of the scope of the work which will be sure to excite interest and kindle a desire to read the whole. We quote a few sentences:

"Savonarola says: 'One only knows that which he practices.' All a man really knows of faith is measured by the faith which he himself exercises. But strong, enthusiastic believers have something like a magnetic power of moving and mastering others, and of inspiring their own faith in minds that become familiar with their experience and writings.

"The author confesses to such a healthy magnetism from the writers with which this volume deals; and although one or more of them be little known and less commended by the literati, they have made their powerful mark upon the mind of Christendom.

"In the mind of the author there is no manner of doubt that an all-wise Providence and the motions of the Holy Spirit are rapidly bringing in the period when the anticipations of Chalmers, more than fifty years ago, are in swift process of fulfillment.

"He presaged the day when what he termed the Theologia Elenctica, after having performed a most important temporary service, would be dispensed with. 'Its technology,' he says, 'will fall into desuetude, because, framed as it was for the special object of neutralizing the heresies which then will no longer exist, its employment will be uncalled for. God's own truth, expressed in God's own language, will form the universal creed of intelligent and harmonized and happy Christendom. Men's faith and their affections, when this intermediate and temporary apparatus is at length taken down, will come into more direct contact with heaven's original revelation, and the spirit of good-will to men which prompted heaven's message, will be felt in all its freshness and power, when the uproar of controversy is stilled and its harsh and jarring discords have died away into everlasting silence."

The voluminous table of contents is full of suggestive titles, whose promise, if fulfilled, will make the volume well worth a careful study, and from the pages before us a paragraph like this will show how well the hope will be answered:

"In the age to come of holiness by faith alone, the high-water mark of present sanctification, hitherto reached only by the select few at wide intervals, may prove by the grace of Christ to be the common level for the multitude, without number, of heaven's elect! The upward gravitation of grace will be stronger than the downward drawing of depravity; and men will be everywhere rising, as by a law of Christian evolution, from the death of sin unto the life of holiness, by the uplifting power of faith. The glorious liberty of the sons of God will then be no vanishing dream of a future heaven, but the present realized possession of a victorious life on earth, through faith in the Crucified!

"And then will the melancholy wail of Wordsworth,—

> 'Tis the most difficult of tasks to keep > Heights which the soul is competent to gain,'

give place to the apostle's exultant pæan, 'THANKS BE TO GOD WHICH GIVETH US THE VICTORY THROUGH OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST.'"

The November Century begins the thirty-first volume of this popular magazine. "A Photographer's Visit to Petra," which opens the magazine, is one of the most attractively illustrated articles ever printed in the magazine. Edward L. Wilson contributes a narrative of his daring journey to the decayed city of Petra, and of his adventures with the Arabs. Edmund Gosse contributes a second illustrated paper on "Living English Sculptors." Several fine illustrations accompany the paper on "Setters," in the "Typical Dogs" series. General Grant's paper describing the campaign and battle of "Chattanooga" is a feature of the number which will excite world-wide interest. It is, perhaps, the most finished article by him which the Century has thus far published. With it is given a full-page portrait of General Grant, from a photograph taken at Mount McGregor; and two fac-simile pages of a part of one of his letters to Dr. Douglas. A discussion of the question of possible unification of American churches is begun in this number by the Rev. Dr. Charles W. Shields, Professor of the Harmony of Science and Revealed Religion at Princeton. Under the heading, "The United Churches of the United States," he deals especially with their existing agreement in doctrine, polity, and worship; but his labored and unconvincing argument for the adoption of the English prayer-book as a church ritual weakens the whole paper. Representative men in the different denominations will continue the discussion. A fine full-page engraving of Robert Koehler's painting, "The Socialist," accompanies a striking essay on socialism by the Rev. Dr. Lyman Abbott, entitled, "Danger Ahead." Edward Everett Hale contributes a pleasant account of the Chautauqua Courses for home study; and questions of interest are discussed in "Topics of the Times" and "Open Letters."

The English Illustrated Magazine is replete this month with choice bits of old English scenery in the articles "Newcastle-on-Tyne," "London Commons," and "Cheese-farming in Chester." One is able during the year by a careful study of the articles of this character in the Magazine to gain an intelligent and vivid idea of English out-door life and scenery.

A new volume of St. Nicholas magazine is adorned with a new cover of far more tasteful design than the old. Three articles are in continuation of series begun in the last volume: "Schumann," in the musical composers' series; "Great Rome again," in the entertaining tour of Europe by Frank R. Stockton, and "Among the Lawmakers." Louisa M. Alcott teaches little people that bread is better than candy, in an amusing illustrated paper, and "Giant Turtles" and a portion of the "Jack in the Pulpit" department tell of some things in natural history with pen and pencil. The story of "Our Joe" is almost as good as owning a parrot.

Vick's Magazine for the month discourses of the "Profits of Horticulture," "Tree Planting and Tree Protection," "Salad Plants," "How to Start a Timber Plantation," and a score of other things in which our farmer friends should be interested; and the illustrations brighten the pages through the whole.

THE HOME.

SONNET.

Glory to God! and to that Power who came
In filial duty, clothed with love divine,
Which made his earthly tabernacle shine
Like ocean, burning with purpurial flame
Or like that Alpine mount which takes its name
From roseate hues; far kenned at morn and even,
In quiet times, and when the storm is driven
Across its nether region's stalwart frame.
Earth prompts, heaven urges—let us seek the light,
Mindful of that pure intercourse begun
When first our infant brows their luster won.
So, like the mountain, may we glow more bright,
Through unimpeded commerce with the sun,
At the approach of all-involving night.

THE VOICE AT MIDNIGHT.

BY AMELIA E. BARR.

"It is the King's highway that we are in: and know this, His messengers are on it. They who have ears to hear, will hear: and He opens the eyes of some, and they see things not to be lightly spoken of."

It was John Balmuto who said these words to me. John was a Shetlander, and for forty years he had gone to the Artic seas with the whale-boats. Then there had come to him a wonderful experience. He had been four days and nights alone with God upon the sea, among mountains of ice reeling together in perilous madness, and but little light but the angry flush of the aurora. Then, undoubtedly, was born that strong faith in the Unseen which made him an active character in the facts I am going to relate.

After his marvellous salvation, he devoted his life to the service of God by entering that remarkable body of lay evangelists attached to the Presbyterian church in Highland parishes, called "The Men," and he became noted throughout the Hebrides for his labors, and for his knowledge of the Scriptures.

Circumstances that summer had thrown us together; I, a young woman just entering an apparently fortunate life; he, an aged saint, standing on the borderland of eternity. And we were sitting together in the gray summer gloaming, when he said to me, "Thou art silent to-night. What hast thou then on thy mind?"

"I had a strange dream. I cannot shake off its influence. Of course it is folly and I don't believe in dreams at all." And it was then he said to me, "It is the King's highway that we are in, and know this. His messengers are on it."

"But it was only a dream."

"Well, God speaks to his children in dreams, and by the oracles that come in darkness."

"He used to do so."

"Wilt thou then say that he has ceased to speak so to men? Now, I will tell thee a thing that happened: I will tell thee just the bare facts; I will put nothing to, nor take anything away from them.

"'Tis five years ago the first day of last June. I was in Stornoway in the Lews, and I was going to the Gairloch Preachings. It was rough, cheerless weather, and all the fishing fleet were at anchor for the night, with no prospect of a fishing. The fishers were sitting together talking over the bad weather, but, indeed, without that bitterness I have heard from landsmen when it would be the same trouble with them. So I gathered them into Donald Brae's cottage, and we had a very good hour. I noticed a stranger in the corner of the room, and some one told me he was one of those men who paint pictures and I saw that he was busy with a pencil and paper even while we were at the service. But the next day I left for the Preachings, and I thought no more of him, good or bad.

"On the first of September I was in Oban. I had walked far and was very tired, but I went to John MacNab's cottage, and after I had eat my kippered herring and drank my tea, I felt better. Then I talked with John about the resurrection of the body, for he was in a tribulation of thoughts and doubts as to whether our Lord had a permanent humanity or not.

"And I said to him, 'John, Christ redeemed our whole nature, and it is this way: The body being ransomed, as well as the spirit, by no less a price than the body of Christ, shall be equally cleansed and glorified.' Now, then, after I had gone to my room. I was sitting thinking of these things, and of no other things whatever. There was not a sound but that of the waves breaking among the rocks, and drawing the tinkling pebbles down the beach after them. The ears of my spiritual body were opened, and I heard these words: 'I will go with thee to Glasgow!' I began to argue with myself thus: 'Whatever for should I go to Glasgow? I know not any one there. No one knows me. I have duties at Portree not to be left. I have no money for such a journey—

"I fell asleep to such thoughts. Then I dreamed of—or I saw—a woman, fair as the daughters of God, and she said, 'I will go with thee to Glasgow!' With a strange feeling of being hurried and pressed I awoke—wide awake, and without any conscious will of my own, I answered, 'I am ready. I am ready now.'

"As I left the cottage it was striking twelve, and I wondered what means of reaching Glasgow I should find at midnight. But I walked straight to to the pier, and there was a small steamer with her steam up. She was blowing her whistle impatiently, and when the skipper saw me coming, he called to me, in a passion, 'Well, then, is it all night I shall wait for thee?'

"I soon perceived that there was a mistake, and that it was not John Balmuto he had been instructed to wait for. But heeded not that; I was under orders I durst not disobey. She was a trading steamer, with a perishable cargo of game and lobsters, and so she touched at no place whatever till we reached Glasgow. One of her passengers was David McPherson, of Harris, a very good man, who had known me in my visitations. He was going to Glasgow as a witness in a case to be tried between the Harris fishers and their commision-house in Glasgow.

"As we walked together from the steamer, he said to me: 'Let us go round by the court-house, John, and I'll find out when I'll be required.' That was to my mind: I did not feel as if I could go astray, whatever road was taken, and I turned with him the way he desired to go. He found the lawyer who needed him in the court-house, and while they talked together I went forward and listened to the case that was in hand.

"It was a trial for murder, and I could not keep my eyes off the young man who was charged with the crime. He seemed to be quite broken down with shame and sorrow. Before McPherson called me, the court closed and the constables took him away. As he passed me our eyes met, and my heart dirled and burned, and I could not make out whatever would be the matter with me. All night his face haunted me. I was sure I had seen it some place; and besides, it would blend itself with the dream which had brought me to Glasgow.

"In the morning I was early at the court-house and saw the prisoner brought in. There was the most marvellous change in his looks. He walked like a man who has lost fear, and his face was quite calm. But now it troubled me more than ever. Whatever had I to do with the young man? Yet I could not bear to leave him.

"I listened and found out that he was accused of murdering his uncle. They were travelling together and were known to have been at Ullapool on the 30th of May. On the first of June the elder man was found in a lonely place, near Oban, dead, and, without doubt, from violence. The chain of circumstantial evidence against the nephew was very strong. To judge by it, I would have said myself to him, 'Thou art certainly guilty.'

"On the other side the young man declared that he had quarrelled with his uncle at Ullapool and left him clandestinely. He had taken passage in a Manx fishing smack, which was going to the Lews, but he had forgotten the name of the smack. He was not even certain if the boat was Manx. The landlord of the inn at which he had stayed when in the Lews, did not remember him. 'A thing not to be expected,' he told the jury, 'for in the summer months, what with visitors, and what with the fishers, a face in Stornoway was like a face on a crowded street. The young man might have been there'—

"The word Stornoway made the whole thing clear to me. The prisoner was the man I had noticed with the pencil and paper among the fishers in Donald Brae's cottage. Yes, indeed he was! I knew then why I had been sent to Glasgow. I walked quickly to the bar, and lifting my bonnet from my head, I said to the judge, 'My lord, the prisoner was in Stornoway on the first of June. I saw him there!'

"He gave a great cry of joy and turned to me, and in a moment he called out: 'You are the man who read the Bible to the fishers. I remember you. I have your likeness among my drawings.' And I said, 'I am the man.'

"Then my lord, the judge, made them swear me, and he said they would hear my evidence. For one moment I was a coward. I thought I would hide God's share in the deliverance, lest men should doubt my whole testimony. The next, I was telling the true story; how I had been called at midnight—twice called; how I had found Evan Conochie's boat waiting for me; how on the boat I had met David McPherson, and had been brought to the court-house by him, having no intention or plan of my own in the matter.

"And there was a great awe in the room as I spoke. Everyone believed what I said, and my lord asked for the names of the fishers who were present in Donald Brae's cottage on the night of the first of June. Very well, then, I could give many of them, and they were sent for, and the lad was saved, thank God Almighty!"

"How do you explain it, John?"

"No, I will not try to explain it; for it is not to be hoped that any one can explain by human reason the things surpassing human reason."

"Do you know what became of the young man?

"I will tell thee about him. He is a very rich young man, and the only child of a widow, known, like Dorcas of old, for her great goodness to the Lord's poor. But when his mother died, it did not go well and peaceably between him and his uncle; and it is true he left him at Ullapool without a word. Well, then, he fell into this sore strait, and it seemed as if all hope of proving his innocence was over.

"But, that very night on which I saw him first, he dreamed that his mother came to him in his cell, and she confronted him and told him, 'To-morrow, surely, thy deliverer shall speak for thee.' He never doubted the heavenly vision. 'How could I?' he asked me. 'My mother never deceived me in life; would she come to me, even in a dream, to tell me a lie? Ah, no!'"

"Is he still alive?"

"God preserve him for many a year yet! I'll only require to speak his name"—and when he had done so, I knew the secret spring of thankfulness that fed the never-ceasing charity of one great, good man.

"And yet, John," I urged, "how can spirit speak with spirit?"

"'How?' I will tell thee, that word 'how' has no business in the mouth of a child of the God. When I was a boy, who had dreamed 'how' men in London might speak with men in Edinburgh through the air, invisible and unheard? That is a matter of trade now. Canst thou imagine what subtle secret lines there may be between the spritual world and this world?"

"But dreams, John?"

"Well, then, dreams. Take the dream life out of the Bible and, oh, how much thou wilt lose! All through it, this side of the spiritual world, presses close on the human side. I thank God for it. Yes, indeed! Many things I hear and see which say to me that Christians now have a kind of shame in what is mystical or supernatural. But thou be sure of this—the supernaturalism of the Bible, and of every Christian life, is not one of the difficulties of our faith, it is the foundation of our faith. The Bible is a supernatural book, the law of a supernatural religion; and to part with this element, is to lose out of it the flavor of heaven, and the hope of immortality. Yes, indeed!"

This conversation occurred thirty years ago. Two years since, I met the man who had experienced such a deliverance, and he told me again the wonderful story, and showed me the pencil sketch he had made of John Balmuto in Donald Brae's cottage. He had painted from it a grand picture of his deliverer, wearing the long black camlet cloak and handkerchief of the order of evangelists to which he belonged. I stood reverently before the commanding figure, with its inspired eyes and rapt expression; for, during those thirty years, I had also learned that it was only those

Weeping upon their bed have sate,

WONDERS OF THE SEA.

If we knew all about everything around us, what a dull home this would be. The fact that there is a world of things to discover, a mine from which to take unknown and priceless jewels, is a stimulus that makes life worth living. The great fields in science and astronomy have scarcely been entered; and the sea, which occupies three-fifths of the surface of our earth, may be said to be still a mystery. The turbulent waves are like sentinels which guard the secrets of the deep; under their cover there are vast forests, exceeding those on the earth both in grandeur and beauty; there are mountains by the side of which our snow-capped summits are as children, and great plains, like those west of the Mississippi, or the pampas of South America. Our plains are covered with tall grass; but the lands of the sea are overgrown for miles with white, pink, and red coral, while here and there beautiful anemones wave their delicate feelers in the current, or great fields of lacelike seaweed of all kinds and tints sway back and forth.

At the depth of about thirty-five hundred feet the waves are not felt, and the temperature is the same, varying only a trifle from the ice of the pole to the burning sun of the equator. Through this calm water, warm currents, like rivers, flow for thousands of miles. In this vast arena, myriads of the finny tribe live, some in one place, others wandering about in bands a million strong, fighting, marrying, forming nations, building houses; and then die, or perhaps fall a prey to the hungry whale or shark. While the sun is forming rainbows in the white-cap waves, there may be a carnage going on below, to which Austerlitz and Waterloo are not to be compared. There are snakelike fish, twenty feet long and an inch or two in breadth, sliding along in the mud, and others, resembling the cod, which swallow fish four times their size. then lie imbedded in the mud and weeds for days, until the food is digested. A mile down the water has a pressure of over a ton to the square inch, and there may be found fish bearing a pressure of more than fifteen tons, which, if brought quickly to the surface would burst, from want of force on the outside to balance that within.

One of the first things a boy will do, on arriving at the seashore, is to taste the water to see for himself if a whole ocean can be salt. If a box six feet deep were filled with sea water, and allowed to evaporate under the sun, there would be two inches of salt left on the bottom. Taking the average depth of the ocean to be three miles, there would be a layer of pure salt 230 feet thick on the bed of the Atlantic. If all the seas could be dried up, there would be 1,000,000,000 cubic miles of common salt. Where a fresh-water river empties into the sea, the surrounding water is of course more free from salt; and where there is little outlet and continual evaporation, as in the Dead Sea, and Salt Lake, Utah, there is correspondingly more sediment to a thousand parts. In the Dead Sea, the water is so dense that a man's body will easily float. Salt is composed of little cubes, like crystal, which appear white when a number are laid on top of each other and the sunlight is kept from passing through. There are many other substances in sea water, as silver, arsenic enough to poison the whole world, chlorine, nitrogen, carbon, sulphur, and so on.

The water is colder at the bottom than at the surface. In Madagascar, near Africa, where it is 75° at the top, down 420 fathoms the thermometer lowers to 51°. In the many bays and fjords on the coast of Norway, the water often freezes at the bottom before it does above; and sometimes, as the fishermen are out in their boats, the sea for miles will be suddenly filled with cakes of ice which have broken up and risen from the ground, endangering and often proving fatal to the frail boats which happen to be cut.

One of the greatest perils or the Atlantic is its icebergs, which are very hard to see on a dark night until too late to be avoided. Not long ago an ocean steamer suddenly came upon one in the dark, and only a few boards were left to tell the story. Where it is very cold the water freezes as it comes down the rivers. The ice at the mouth is pushed out into the sea by that above, until it breaks off, when it floats south, sometimes as far as New York. The greater part is under water, so that, if you see a cake of ice one hundred feet high, there will very likely be seven hundred feet below the surface to balance. As it moves on, the heat beneath melts away the bottom until it can stand no longer; then the great berg turns over and over, like a wheel, until it finds its equilibrium.

Waves are very deceptive. To look at them in a storm one would think the water traveled. The water stays in the same place, but the motion goes on. Sometimes in storms, these waves are forty feet high, and travel fifty miles an hour; more than twice as fast as the swiftest steamer. Off the Cape of Good Hope, where the Indian and Atlantic meet, the waves rise to the height of fifty or sixty feet, when vessels near each other are shut out of sight by a wall of water. The distance from valley to valley is generally fifteen times the height; therefore, a wave five feet high will extend over seventy-five feet of water. The motion of a wave has wonderful power. Instances are given where cannon have been wrenched from their places in the mud, and thrown upon the beach, and where a full rigged man-of-war has been left high and dry upon the sand. The force of the sea dashing on Bell Rock lighthouse is said to be seventeen tons for every square yard.

Perhaps you wonder where all the water comes from that fills our great rivers. The sun shows its wonderful power in its work upon the sea. The sunbeams draw the water out into the middle of the sea, then let it run back. That is the tide. It keeps a continual motion throughout the ocean. But a more splendid current is that by evaporation. Every year, a layer of the entire sea, fourteen feet thick, or a cube of thirty miles (27,000 cubic miles) is taken up into the clouds. The winds bear their burden to the land, and the water comes down in rain upon the fields, to flow back at last through rivers, making a circuit of many miles.

The two most interesting problems of the present are, the depth and the life at the bottom of the deep. If the Atlantic were lowered 6,564 feet, the distance from shore to shore would be but half as great, or fifteen hundred miles. If lowered a little more than three miles (19,680 feet) there would be a road of dry land from New Foundland to Ireland. This is the plain on which the great Atlantic cables are laid. The depth is about the same all the way, and the land is some four hundred feet wide, as though it was constructed purposely for the cables, and is called Telegraph Plateau. The Mediterranean is comparatively shallow. The drying up of 660 feet would leave three different seas, and Africa would be joined with Italy. The British Channel is more like a pond, which accounts for its choppy waves. Imagine a miniature of the channel, 547 yards long, and from 36 to 240 yards wide, growing narrower as it reaches the Straits of Dover. On this scale, the average depth would be two inches, and the greatest only two and a half —about 200 feet deep. That 200 feet saved England, and probably London, from Napolcon, who waited weeks for a chance to cross, while the British ships sailed up and down, ready to destroy his transports.

It has been found very difficult to get correct soundings of the Atlantic. A very calm day must be chosen, or the boats will drift and the line not be vertical. Again, great care must be taken lest there be currents below, to drag the line, aud so mislead. Until a few years ago no way could be found to bring up specimens of the bottom; for the weight used to carry the line down, combined with the weight of the soaked rope, was too great. A midshipman of the navy has overcome this difficulty. A shot, weighing thirty pouuds, carries dowu the line. A hole is bored through the sinker, through which a rod of iron is passed, moving easily back and forth. In the end of the bar a cup is dug out, and the inside coated with lard. The bar is made fast to the line, and a sling holds the shot on. When the bar, which extends below the ball, touches the earth, the sling unhooks and the shot slides off. The lard in the eud of the bar holds some of the sand, or whatever may be on the bottom, and a trap shuts over the cup to keep the water from washing the sand out. When the ground is reached a shock is felt, as if an electric current had passed through the line.

In latitude 36 degrees 49 minutes South and longitude 37 degrees 6 minutes West, the depth was found to be eight and three-fourths miles. The clay-like substance brought up was sent to Europe and America, and found to be entirely composed of shells. The little animals probably lived on the seaweed in Saragossa Sea until they died and dropped off. Then they floated along, sinking farther and farther until the gases were all out of their bodies, and finally sank to the ground. It is supposed that the whole ocean is covered with a layer of these delicate little animals. Near the Fiji Islands Foraminifera are found over a mile below the waves. An ounce of the same life from the Adriatic contained six thousand, and D'Orbigny estimates in one pound from the Caribbean Sea nearly four million individual animals. Rear-Admiral Denham made soundings in latitude 20 degrees 45 minutes South and longitude 37 degrees 47 minutes West, and found a plateau eighty miles long and twelve wide, and anchored in mid ocean. When other vessels came by, the men could not believe their eyes when they saw a ship, with all sails furled, lying at anchor in the middle of the sea. The place was called Victoria Shoal. Here great numbers of whale raise their young, and sport in the shallow waters.

Sometimes the water for thirty miles around looks like a sea of fire, or again like milk. This effect is made by little insects swimming on the water, 300 of which make but a single inch. Another beautiful sight is sometimes seen in the Bay of Biscay. The sea for miles around is tinted a light red. This is caused by a marine plant, so small that in one square inch there are as many as 25,000,000. One of the smallest animals in the ocean is the infusoria. It is round, like a globe, and one two-hundred-and-fifty-millionth of an inch in diameter; that is, if 250,000,000 were laid in a row, they would make only an inch; yet Ehrenberg says that they have great appetites, some being the possessors of two hundred stomachs. Think of there being 200 stomachs in one two-hundred-and-fifty-millionth of an inch!

There are shapeless masses of brown sponge, beautiful coralline, waving their slender arms to and fro; long ribbon fish that gleam like burnished silver, and others with rows of phosphorescent light to brighten the depths; parrot fish, with gaudy feathers, browse upon the the young tips of growing coral. "Fantastically-formed little shrimp-like beings almost as transparent as the water itself, and invisible but for the crimson and violet marks that bedeck their bodies, are sailing or shooting through the weedy groves. . . . Then, like the demon of the Paradise, comes stealing along the grim and hateful shark, with his little green eyes of concentrated malignity."—Chas. K. Bolton in the Independent.

TEMPERANCE.

FATHERS AND MOTHERS, TAKE WARNING.

A few years ago there lived in an inland town of this Province a wealthy merchant; a benevolent, Christian man, deacon of the church, and teacher of the Bible-class in the Sabbath school. He brought up a family of healthy, intelligent children; but, as they came of age, all showed a strange liking for alcoholic drinks. Of his three sons, one is dead; the others are confirmed drunkards. The father, discouraged, neglected his business, and failed. One of his daughters married well, but found it impossible to let the curse alone. She became so besotted as to be the victim of delirium tremens. Only about three weeks ago, disgusted with herself, and probably feeling one of the attacks coming on, she committed suicide by taking a large quantity of laudanum. She left two boys and a heart-broken husband behind her. And now, fathers and mothers, what was the cause of this misery? A lady brought up in the same family tells me it was the custom to keep beer in the house at all times, to which the whole family had access. The stronger liquors were also kept for special occasions. The children helped themselves to the beer and pilfered the other liquors. She tells me that she herself acquired so strong a taste for it that she found great difficulty in breaking off the habit, but being younger, and thus forewarned, broke the habit before it was too late. This story is an actual fact, and points its own moral.—Montreal Witness.

Power of Appetite.—An illustration of the dangerous tendencies of the habitual use of intoxicants is furnished in the case of Chaplain John Vaughn Lewis, of the United States Army, who is to be tried by court-martial for drunkenness. He was once a rector of Trinity church in Norwich, Ct., and was much esteemed for his social qualities and active labors. But the "dead fly in the apothecary's ointment," was the wine on the dinner table. He became rector of St. John's, Washington. There something stronger than wine was used, and he was compelled to leave on account of drunkness. Friends procured for him a chaplaincy in the army under a promise from him to reform; but he has yielded to the temptation and fallen. Drinking in the army is not under ban; but to get drunk is a disgrace. It is a poor place for a drunkard to reform, unless he is a soldier from whom liquor is kept away. Not so the officers who can readily obtain it. The lesson in this case is,"Look not upon the wine when it is red," etc.,a lesson given in the days of Solomon.—Christian Secretary.

A Few Facts About Whiskey.—Onc bushel of the best corn will only make three gallons of whisky; but a little strychnine easily raises the quantity to four gallons. This is so universal, that four gallons is now an average yield. One drug house in London, in 1867, sold more strychnine to a liquor house than the whole city could use medicinally. Mark the progress in evil. A distiller adds one-fourth by the use of strychuine. The wholesaler takes this adultrated stock and doubles it, by the use of strychnine and opium. The retailer gives it another turn. He doubles it by the use of belladonna. This brings ten cents a driuk, and here is the motive power. This is the practice all over the land. —Dr. Fowler.

The Decatur (Illinois) Sentinel says: "Cornell, a town in Livingston county, during a dram-shop rule of ten years, paid a pauper bill of $1,100 a year. Then it changed to prohibition, and at the end of four years the pauper expense was reduced to $2.50, which was paid for medicine. Yet some people claim that prohibition doesn't pay."

THE CHURCHES.

—Rev. B. A. Imes of the Congregational church, Memphis, Tenn., preached a powerful sermon on Sabbath, October 25th, the week following the last assault on Rev. R. N. Countee, upon that attempt at lodge assassination. The character of secret organizations he shows makes them liable to be used for such infamous purposes.

—Chartiers Presbytery, on the day of prayer for Sabbath schools, took a collection for the mission to the Warm Springs Indians, Oregon. Rev. R. W. McBride, son of Bro. Wm. McBride, Elmira, Ill., is the missionary at this station.

—Rev. R. A. McAyleal, D. D., of Lawrence, Mass. was appointed synodical missionary by the Boston Presbytery of the United Presbyterian church.

—Rev. W. H. French, D. D., Cincinnati, lately addressed the students of the U. P. Theological Seminary at Allegheny, Pa., on the principles that should govern the United Presbyterian church in co-operating with other churches. The address is to be published, and will be read by thousands with interest who know how firmly Dr. French maintains those principles that separate the United from the other branches of the Presbyterian family, especially the testimony against the lodge and the use of the divine Psalms.

—Rev. D. S. Kinney, agent of the Wesleyan Methodist churches reports that none of the fall conferences which he has visited since Augnst, have passed without conversions. Some 300 persons in all had professed Christ during these meetings.

—Bro. Garabed Kevorkian, an Armenian who studied medicine in this city, several years ago, in preparation for missionary work in western Asia, was engaged by the Missionary Societyof the Disciple-church. In July 1884 he came to the villiage of Hajee Keny, where his labors were blessed and he organized the believers into a church. They send an earnest letter to the home society.

—Rev. J. D. Potter, the evangelist of Westboro, Mass., has been holding services at the Trnmbull Avenue Congregational church, Detroit.

—For a number of years Mr. Spurgeon has been forced to flee from the English winter with its fogs and east winds and other provocations of rheumatic ills, and find refuge in Mentone, on the Mediterranean. As a result of rigorous adherance to a strictly vegetable diet, he finds himself, this antumn, able to brave his old enemy, and so proposes to keep at his post in London the winter through.

—A multitude of people attended the meetings, held last week in the new Tabernacle, at 395 Broome street, corner of Centre Market Place, New York, by Messrs. Moody and Sankey. The Tabernacle was dedicated the previons Saturday evening by the City Mission. Religious services especially for the benefit of the people of the neighborhood will be held every evening.

—The sixth annual convention of the Inter-Seminary Alliance was held at Rochester, N. Y., Oct. 22d and 25th. It was largely attended, thirty-fonr seminaries out of the fifty-three belonging to the Alliance being represented. There were upwards of 300 delegates from the principal seminaries, the stndents of the Rochester Seminary, of conrse, attending in a body.

—While Rev. Dr. C. H. Parkhurst, of the Madison Square Presbyterian chnrch New York, was preaching Sabbath evening, Nov. 1st., on the subject "Is Life Worth Living?" his voice gradually failed, and when he had reached the middle of his sermon he was obliged to ask the congregation to excnse him from finishing it.

—In the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal church last week, Bishop Bowman presided, and delegates were present from all parts of the country. A resolution was passed in which it was voted to raise $1,000,000 for missionary purposes during the coming year.

—The reports of the American Missionary Association show that the receipts for the year aggregated $290,894, and expenditures $306,345, leaving a debt of $15,451, which added to the debt of last year, $13,785, makes a total debt of $29,237. Endowments and special funds yielded in addition $11,000. Receipts for the support of Berea College were $19,378; of Hampton Institute, $79,080; of Atlanta University, $19,460; making the grand total of receipts for the society $419,813. The Association has in charge 112 schools and 119 missionaries in the South; membership, 6,881. Seventeen churches have been organized within the year and numerous successful revivals have been held. In education in the South the Association has six chartered institutions, fourteen normal and graded schools, thirty-six common schools, 250 instructors, and 8,253 pupils. The mountain white work in Kentucky and Tennessee has been prosecuted with somewhat remarkable success. Among the Indians they have five churches, seven ministers, 301 church members, fifteen schools, fifty-three teachers, and 706 pupils. The work is chiefly in Nebraska and Dakota, among the Sioux. Among the Chinese there are eighteen schools, thirty-eight missionaries and 1,457 pupils; 171 Chinese have ceased from idol worship dnring the year.

—A letter has been published from a lady connected with Bishop William Taylor's African mission, which speaks of the remarkable health of the company. She writes from St. Panl de Loando, where a number of men and women have been waiting for some time to take a steamer up the Coanza river for the interior. She says she has regained her usual weight, while her husband has gained 33 pounds in six weeks. "It is remarkable," she says, "that a company as large as we were should have suffered so little on the west coast of Africa. The traders who came on the Biafra with us, and stopped at different points above us, prophesied and told us that it was folly for us to come to Africa; that we would all die, etc. And, as for bringing women and children here and expecting them to live, that was simply absurd. We have heard from a reliable sonrce that two of them died, and also a clerk of one of the traders, while two or three are going home for their health, cannot stay, and some of the others have fared worse than we in regard to sickness. I think one reason is that they are a high-living, hard-drinking set, and when sickness seizes them, they become immediate victims to its ravages. They did not number half as many as our company; and while they—strong men—have succumbed, the women and children have, by the help of God, stood it."

—The Indian Baptists of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Association report no fewer than 200 baptisms in the past year. One Indian church reported thirty-eight baptisms, with a membership of ninety-nine. Two new churches were received, and six were dismissed to form another association. The Association has kept a missionary among the wild tribes of the plains, besides paying the board and tuition of one Indian ministerial stndent at Indian University. The members come nearer paying one-tenth of their income into the Lord's treasury than most of the churches of the States.

—The manifesto of the "Chnrchmen's Disestablishment League" has appeared in England. The churchmen of the Leagne declare that, having "no hope of reform of the church by the chnrch for it is in the hands of those who wonld be dispossessed by the reform," and, being nrgently desirons of securing for it "freedom from Parliamentary interference," and from the "hideons train" of evils associated with the existing system, their urgent advice to chnrchmen is unitedly to "vote for Disestablishment candidates."

—The General Conference of Seventh-day Baptists held its session this year at Alfred Center, N. Y. Nearly 1,000 delegates and visitors were in attendance. Sixty-five churches reported to the Conference, leaving twenty-nine not reporting. There were reported 234 baptisms; and five new chnrches, with a total membership of fifty-seven, were admitted. The amount raised for denominational missionary work of all kinds averages over $2 for each member of the denomination, while the total funds reported (incomplete) make the average abont $4.50 per member. Abont 6,000 are in the Bible schools of the churches, and 282 baptisms are reported among Sabbath school scholars. The Conference passed a resolution favoring prohibition as a principle, and also one against the anti-Chinese law. The Memorial Board reported over $82,000 held in trust for varions (mostly edncational) purposes. The report of the Missionary Board included the following points of interest: Receipts, $9,886.87; expenditures, $9,524.38; a debt (for the first time in many years) of $1,392.62; a church in Shanghai, China, of eighteen members, with three missionaries, and several native helpers; two chnrches in Holland, with one missionary, and some helpers; nine additions, and a new church organized; Scandinavian missions in Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Dakota, with two missionaries, eighty-seven chnrch members, four churches, six baptisms.

THE CONGO COUNTRY.

The Independent says: The Rev. George Grenfell, of the London Baptist Mission on the Congo, has made a trip, in the mission steamer, on the Upper Congo, which will add materially to our knowledge of the geography of Central Africa. He started from Stanley Pool with a small party, October 13th, and was gone five months. His turning point was Stanley Falls, near the point where the Congo returns from its northern debouche to cross the equator to the south. He was accompanied by his wife and child, and by Dr. Sims, of the American Baptist Missionary Union, two-thirds of the way, besides the crew and several school-children. The party was in peril many times from rocks and storms, and from the savages. They were attacked a score of times with sticks, stones, spears, and poisoned arrwos; but managed to escape unhurt. In the course of the expedition, six hundred miles of water way, previously unvisited by white men, was explored. The most important discovery was that the Mobangi river, which enters the Congo from the north, nearly opposite the Equatorial station, is the largest tributary of the great Congo water course. He spent five weeks on it, and ascended it a distance of four hundred to fonr hnndred and fifty miles. It is believed that the upper part of it is identical with the Welle river, which has been so long an African mystery. The banks of the Mobangi are very populons. He also explored, for some distance, the Ikelemba river, and visited Danda, a cnrious town. At Bangala, a hundred or a hundred and fifty miles above the mouth of the Mobangi, Mr. Grenfell came face to face with cannibalism. He says:

"At the time I commenced this journey I conld scarcely bring myself to believe the terrible stories which reached me from time to time. Since coming first to the Congo the farther I traveled the farther cannibalism seemed to recede; everybody had it to say that their neighbors on beyond were bad; that they 'eat men,' till I began to grow skeptical; but here at Bangala I absolutely caught up with it, and was obliged to allow what I had hoped to be able to maintain as 'not proven.' I will not sicken yon with the details of the preparation, as some of our boys gave them when they came to tell me in the hope that I shonld be able to interfere; but, before they reached the steamer, the big drum's dum-dum announced the final act. Neither will I tell yon of the horrible things they saw when they afterward returned to the scene. The natives conld not, or at least appeared not to, nnderstand why the white man and his people should take exception to their proceedings. 'Why,' said they to one of onr boys, 'do you interfere with us? We don't tronble you when you kill your goats. We buy onr Nyama (meat) and kill it; it is not your affair.' Lieutenant Coquilhat has tried his utmost, and placed himself in no small difficnlty by his attempts to put a stop to these cnstoms; but he says, and I quite realize it, that it cannot be done without fighting for it, and that to buy the intended victim would only be to give them the price for three others. From this point on the evidences of cannibalism were continually recnrring, thongh the reluctant manner in which at some places the people acknowledged being 'men eaters,' leads us to hope that a sentiment against it already exists'

THANKSGIVING.

WASHINGTON, NOV. 2.—The following proclamation was issued to-day:

By the President of the United States of America:

A PROCLAMATION.

The American people have always abundant cause to be thankful to Almighty God, whose watchful care and guiding hand have been manifested in every stage of their national life, guarding and protecting them in time of peril, and safely leading them in the hour of darkness and danger. It is fitting and proper that a nation thus favored should on one day in every year, for that purpose specially appointed, publicly acknowledge the goodness of God, and return thanks to him for all his gracious gifts.

Therefore, I, Grover Cleveland, President of the United States of America, do hereby designate and set apart Thursday, the 26th day of November instant, as a day of public thanksgiving and prayer, and do invoke the observance of the same by all the people of the land.

On that day let all secular business be suspended. And let the people assemble in their usual places of worship, and with prayer and songs of praise devoutly testify their gratitude to the Giver of every good and perfect gift for all that he has done for us in the year that has passed; for our preservation as a united nation, and for our deliverance from the shock and danger of political convulsion; for the blessings of peace and for our safety and quiet while wars and rumors of wars have agitated and afflicted other nations of the earth; for our security against the scourge of pestilence, which in other lands has claimed its dead by thousands, and filled the streets with mourners; for plenteous crops which reward the labor of the husbandman and increase our nation's wealth; and for the contentment throughout our borders which follows in the train of prosperity and abundance. And let there also be on the day thus set apart a reunion of families sanctified and chastened by tender memories and associations; and let the social intercourse of friends with pleasant reminiscence renew the ties of affection and strengthen the bonds of kindly feeling.

And let us by no means forget, while we give thanks and enjoy the comforts which have crowned our lives, that truly grateful hearts are inclined to deeds of charity, and that a kind and thoughtful remembrance of the poor will double the pleasures of our condition and render our praise and thanksgiving more acceptable in the sight of the Lord.

Done at the City of Washington, this second day of November, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five, and of the independence of the United states the one hundred and tenth.

HOME HINTS.

THE FEET.

At this season of the year it is usual, especially for the aged, to suffer in bed with cold feet. The usual remedy is the use of hot bricks and the like, carried to bed with more or less regularity, for about five months of the year. This of necessity aggravates the difficulty, compelling one to depend more or less on artificial heat, instead of preventing the escape of the heat by conduction.

Let it be remembered that the great principle is that the human body generates its own heat, the only object in this respect of the use of clothing being to prevent the too rapid escape of such heat generated by the lungs, etc. These heat-generating powers, like all others of the system, will do much if compelled to, or they will lie dormant just to the extent that artificial heat is applied.

It is very injudicious for the aged and for those whose powers are reduced from any cause, to thrust the feet into cold water, as a means of increasing the heat, since the shock is too great, and since the temporary gain, if any, will be followed by a loss of power, which this class can not afford.

Instead of this injudicious course, let something be done to increase the circulation of the blood, that the warm fluid in the heart—warmed in the lungs, by an actual combustion of the waste and worthless matter in them—may reach the extremities doing their appropriate work. This may be effected by friction of the whole surface, as by a flesh brush, a crash, etc., or by exercise. It is a good idea to rub the bottoms of the feet on a coarse rug, or its equivalent, just before retiring. If this is not sufficient, instead of the constant use of the hot brick, it is well to be sure to have the feet warm on retiring, and then put them into a warm and thick rug, allowing the two to come in contact. This will ordinarily prove all that may be needed.—Justice.

OILING SHOES.

A one-armed bootblack having taken the contract to oil the shoes of a reporter, after the preliminary brushing began by rubbing the leather with a wet cloth. When asked what it was for he explained: 'When I began this business," said the operator, pausing a moment to cast an admiring glance at the high, aristocratic arch of the news gatherer's instep, "I used to keep on rubbing the oil into the leather until a man told me to stop. I thought they'd know when they had enough, and I wanted to give satisfaction. Some of my customers complained that the oil soaked through their boots and saturated their socks. I thought perhaps I had been putting on too much oil, but the same fault was found in several cases where I had been more careful. Finally an old shoemaker whom I knew came along and I asked him what I ought to do to save my trade. He told me never to oil a shoe until I had first wet it. The reason was that the water would penetrate the leather, and, remaining there, keep the oil from soaking through. Besides the water would soften the leather and open it so that the oil would do the leather more good. My trade has prospered ever since.

"I was oiling a man up one day and he asked the same question you did. When I explained the reason he said that was on the same principal as that of painting kerosene oil barrels. I told him I thought they were painted blue just to look nice. He said it was to prevent the barrels from leaking. During a long voyage or a journey by rail sometimes half a barrel would leak through the pores of the wood and evaporate. So some sharp fellow began to study some way of preventing such loss. He first painted the barrel blue on the outside and then filled it with water and allowed it to stand until it had soaked up all it would. Then the oil was put in. The water kept the oil from soaking into the wood, and the paint on the outside kept the water from coming out. He got a patent on his discovery and now sits in his office and draws his royalty of one cent on every barrel made to hold kerosene oil for shipment. He's got a mighty soft thing on oil barrels."—News.

—Copal varnish applied to the soles of shoes, and repeated as it dries until the pores are filled and the surface shines like polished mahogany, will make the soles waterproof, and last as long as the uppers.

FARM NOTES.

BUSINESS METHODS ON THE FARM.

Farmers might do worse than take a little note of how other business men manage their affairs, and learn something from their observations. A farmer should not be like a clam and shut himself up within the hard shell of his own ways and notions, nor think it matters nothing to him how the world moves, or to the world how he gets along. He may learn a good deal by studying the ways of people in cities that will do him good in his own business. For instance, if he should go into a city workshop, and find one or two men at work in one corner, but all the rest of the great building empty, or, if filled, the machines running empty or wearing out with dust, he would be struck with wonder and amazement. If he were to interview the owner, whom he would certainly think to be crazy, and were told that he had not sufficient means to run the factory, that he could not afford to hire labor, or that he was doing well enough, that he made a living and was well satisfied with what he was doing, our farmer would be more and more amazed. That is, if he were not struck with a similarity between the case of this man and his own, when his thoughts were turned to his own farm, where the larger part of his fields was overrun with weeds; where the crops yielded little more than the seed, for want of tillage or fertilizers; where half his cows failed to pay for their feed; where his crops were destroyed by insects, his land poisoned by stagnant water for want of drainage, and all this was excused because he could not afford to hire labor, or buy fertilizers. or procure good stock, or that he was doing well enough.

If we could only see ourselves as others see us, how differently we would act! It helps us thus to see ourselves to watch closely other men. It helps the farmer to become acquainted with other business men by whose industry and enterprise markets are found for farm products. Competition, too, spurs him to greater efforts or to better methods, but, unless he knows more about what his competitors are and what they are doing than the bare fact that they are growing wheat more cheaply than he is, or are making substitutes for his butter and cheese from cheap lard and tallow, he will be poorly able to keep ahead in the race, and will find himself left behind. In observing the ways of other business men, a farmer will find that each man makes his special business his life's work, and studies it thoroughly inside among his own machinery and work, and outside among his customers, both actual and prospective, and sticks to it through good times and bad; that economy in every way is most strictly enforced, no work or means of any kind being wasted, no opportunity missed, no dead stock being carried, and everything that does not pay being inexorably and immediately cut off. And if he learns no more than this he will at least discover that in a general way the business man who should run his store or workshop as the majority of farms are run would very soon be without any business at all. No doubt it is true that a large proportion of business men fail to succeed. But all these failures are due to the want of the strict business methods which alone insure success, and it is simply an indication that the farmer's business is an excellent and profitable one that so few farmers fail in it, rather than that their methods are the best. So that we see very few farmers succeed in other business, while a great many business men make excellent and successful farmers.—New York Times.

THE FARMER'S CONTENT.

Farming is a slow way to make money but there is a law of compensation about everything in this life, and farming has its blessings that other pursuits do not have He is the freest man upon earth and the most independent. He has more latitude and longitude. He has a house in the country with plenty of pure air and good water. If he makes but little in the field he has occasion to spend but little. He can raise his own hogs, sheep, cattle and chickens. His wood costs him nothing, and the luxury of big backlogs and blazing fires in open fire-places all winter is something that city people long for but cannot afford. My farm cost me $7,000. I have 120 acres of open land in good condition, and it yields me on an average about $5 an acre over all expenses. Say 9 per cent upon the investment. Well, that is mighty little, considering my own labor and supervision. I've seen the time when I made five times as much without any capital except my head. But then we have to keep a pair of horses to ride around, and they have to feed from the farm.—Bill Arp.

This Washboard is made of one solid sheet of heavy corrugated zinc, which produces a double-faced board of the best quality and durability. The fluting is very deep, holding more water, and consequently doing better washing than any washboard in the market. The frame is made of hard wood and held together with an iron bolt running through a tube formed on the lower edge of the zinc, thus binding the whole together in the most substantial manner, and producing a wash board which for economy, excellence and durability, is unquestionably the best in the world. We find so many dealers that object to our board on account of its DURABILITY, saying, "It will last too long We can never sell a customer but one." We take this means to advise customers to INSIST upon having the NORTH STAR WASHBOARD.

The best is the cheapest.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

WASHINGTON.

Col. Casey, of the Army, in charge of the New War Department Building, reports that it will cost when completed, $2,447,000, of which amount $1,663 000 have already been spent. The building will be thoroughly fire-proof, and will form a safe depository for the valuable army records.

New York merchants have petitioned the Postmaster General to re-establish regular mail connections with Mexico and Central and South America.

President Cleveland Tuesday appointed Alfred P. Edgerton, of Fort Wayne, Ind., and William I. Tremholm, of South Carolina, as Civil Service Commissioners. The resignation of Dr. Gregory of Illinois has been accepted, and Dorman B. Eaton will be re-appointed temporarily in his place.

The purchase of the dispatch boat Dolphin by the government has been completed, the negotiations between Secrtary Whitney and Mr Roach having been carried on privately for some time.

COUNTRY.

A fire in the old J. V. Farwell wholesale store in Chicago Friday morning did damage to the goods of the various occupants to the extent of $200,000 to $300,000, without greatly damaging the building.

A storm of wind, thunder and rain at Bloomington, Ill., Friday night tossed hacks about and carried away the roof of the Hungarian roller mill. High wind also prevailed at Duluth, stopping all business in the harbor. The country to south of Springfield, Ill., was reported swept by a cyclone.

Near Aurora, Ind., early Friday morning the steamboats Mountain Girl and James W. Gaff were in collision, the former sinking immediately. She carried a circus and variety show, two of the members of which were drowned. The concern also lost ten valuable horses and a number of snakes.

Master Workman Pinkerton, of the Knights of Labor, and three others have been arrested at St. Louis for causing recent explosions on the street car tracks. It is alleged that dynamite and caps were found at the headquarters of the Knights, and that the prisoners have confessed being implicated in a plot to destoy railroad proptery.

Mrs. Trump, postmistress at Corning, Pa., was arrested for opening letters, her purpose being to keep informed of her neighbors' business and the love affairs of the young people. She did not know that she was violating the laws.

Near Morrisonville, Ill., Tuesday forenoon, a cow partially wrecked a Wabash passenger train, the locomotive falling on its side, the mail-car being wrecked, and the baggage and smoker being derailed. The engineer and fireman were badly hurt, but the passengers escaped with a severe shaking.

Apples in the vicinity of Salisbury, Conn., are so plentiful that they are rotting on the ground. Recently a suggestion was made that the waste be sent to the poor in New York city. The suggestion has been acted upon, and a large number of institutions have applied for a portion of the apples for distribution, and any surplus after these are supplied will be distributed among charitable organizations. It is hoped that other towns will follow the good example of Salisbury.

Fifteen years ago Evansville, Ind., gave bonds amounting to $1,500,000 to aid the Evanville, Henderson and Nashville and Evansville and Paducah Railways. The interest was paid regularly for ten years, at the expiration of which time Evansville repudiated the bonds. Judge Ayers has rendered a decision that the bonds—amounting now, with interest, to $1,900,000—are valid and legal obligations. The case will be taken to the United States Supreme Court.

Every Knight of Labor (save those in the morning newspaper offices) at Galveston, Texas, struck Tuesday, causing a virtual suspension of business. The strike was caused by the refusal of the agent of the Mallory Steamship Line to restore white 'longshoremen recently superseded by colored laborers.

Within a short period 5,000 hogs have died of cholera in Logan county, Illinois, and the disease shows no signs of abating.

Cyrus Yandes was found dead on his father's grave at St. Paul, Wednesday, having committed suicide by shooting. The father, who left an estate estimated at about $1,000,000, had been dead but a few days. It is supposed the son became insane through grief and in brooding over his responsibility in settling the estate.

The Andre monument, near Tarrytown, N. Y., was blown up by an explosion of a dynamite cartridge at 10:20 o'clock on Tuesday night. Both bases were blown to atoms, and the iron fencing that enclosed the monument completely demolished. The shock broke the glass in all houses for a mile around, and in a hotel half a mile distant the globes on the lamps ware shattered. The West Shore depot was jarred and several panes of glass broken.

Two laborers on the new Croton aqueduct were killed while drilling rock by the explosion of an old cartridge that had been left in a drilled hole. Since last May twenty-six men have been killed and the same number more or less injured by accidents on the new aqueduct.

Terrific storms visited many parts of the West and South from the 5th to the 7th inst, often becoming cyclones. At Pierre, Dak., snow fell nine inches deep, street car and railway travel being impeded. At Paris, Ill., rain fell in torrents, followed by hail big as walnuts. A cyclone destroyed several buildings near Peoria. A tornado passed over Spartanburg, S. Carolina, and rains flooded the low lands. At Decatur, Ga., a tornado destroyed buildings, steamboats and other property. A cyclone almost totally destroyed Brownsville, Sumpter county, Ala. Many were injured but no lives lost. Near Dangerfield, Tex., five persons were killed and others injured by a cyclone. As the lines are down in many directions full reports will probably tell of other fatalities.

FOREIGN.

Reports from Winnipeg say the Dominion government, knowing that the medical commission will report adversely to Riel, have ordered the authorities at Regina to hang Riel Tuesday. The same train which carried the doctors also bore the death warrant.

A woman took her boy who was suffering from small-pox, on board a train at Bonaventure, province of Quebec. Becoming frightened at the mutterings of the other passengers, she took the boy to the platform and threw him from the train while it was running sixteen miles an hour.

A dispatch from Rangoon says that at a meeting of his generals in Mandalay, King Theebaw declared that he would personally lead his army against the English. It is believed in Rangoon that the Indian Government will decide to depose King Theebaw, whether he accedes to the English demands or not. Further advices from Burmah say the Shans have risen against King Theebaw.

"BETWEEN TWO OPINIONS."

The issue of this book at this time is opportune, for it provides for reformers a beautiful and timely gift for the holidays. President J. Blanchard says: "At the risk of being deemed an enthusiast, I would rather have written this book of Miss Flagg's than to have written Gray's Elegy, conquered Quebec or written Uncle Tom's Cabin, and we risk the opinion that every careful reader of Miss Flagg's volume who votes with the American party will concur with us in this estimate of it, extravagant as it may seem."

Until January next we will send five sample copies of the Cynosure to one address for TEN CENTS! Has the Cynosure been a household blessing to you? then we want you to help us make it such to your relatives, friends and neighbors. We are dependent on your good will, good word and good work for that which will make this paper what you wish it to be, and give it the circulation you wish it to have. How many homes will you introduce the Cynosure into in the next two months?

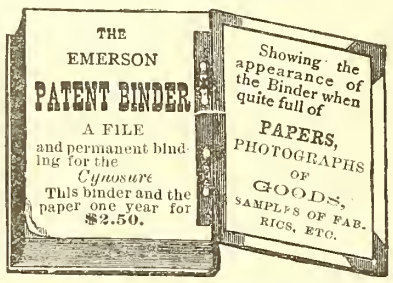
☞The above is not clearly understood by some. Just five sample copies of the Cynosure, and no more, will be sent to one address for ten cents. This offer will be continued until January.



Some of these sample copies bring forth fruit; for example, a letter just received says: "Having read one copy I do sincerely believe it to be one of the best papers I have ever read." And a subscription is enclosed.

A GOOD MANY

TIMES ONE WANTS TO REFER TO SOME ARTICLE IN THE Cynosure, BUT THE NUMBERS ARE KEPT LOOSLY AND SOME ARE LOST, AND THE ARTICLE IN A BACK NUMBER CANNOT BE FOUND. TO MEET THIS DIFFICULTY WE HAVE MADE ARRANGEMENTS TO FURNISH THE

Bishop Ireland preached a sermon in St. Martin's Catholic church, St. Paul, before a large congregation last Sabbath to show that the progress of the nineteenth century outside of the Catholic church was not real progress, because it ended in its benefits to mankind at the grave; it was directed to the temporal and not to the eternal happiness of man. The ideal men and women were those who were taught and who practiced Catholic principles and teachings. There were fragments of Christianity outside of the Catholic church, but true Christianity, and therefore true progress, was to be found only within her teachings. Probably the eloquent Bishop forgot to say where the Catholic church got its patent for Christianity, and so secured such a monopoly. But Protestants yet have a little hope. Everyone may hope that he is one of the fragments at least. Few would care to attempt the proof of the Bishop's declaration about ideal men and women. Set all the Catholic priests in a row, and if there is any character portrayed in the countenance, the Bishop would be ashamed of his ideal. Or, go over to the county jail and look through the cells: the Bishop will find plenty of Catholics, as the three wretched Italians who were hung Saturday, but they are bad for his argument. His arraignment of modern charity is most uncharitable, unless he means the cartloads of spurious stuff palmed off by the lodges. The charities of the Christian church are among the noblest proofs of its faith; and we have great encouragement that it is yet to show its most glorious results as the Spirit and Golden Rule of the Lord become more the spirit and rule of his disciples.

The visit of King Kalakaua of the Sandwich Islands to this country a few years ago will be remembered by all the metropolitan Masonic lodges. All along his route his Hiramite "brethren" feasted and entertained in honor of their royal guest, and grand initiations, with spectacular accompaniments, were provided to please his Masonic fancy. An invitation to one of these performances intended only for faithful Masons found its way into the Cynosure office, and may yet be seen here. But King Kalakaua, though a worthy and accepted Freemason is also a disciple of R. G. Ingersoll, and is using his influence to turn back his people from the state of civilization, to which they have made a most wonderful progress from a cannibal state within two generations, into the darkness of idolatry. His sister, who stands next in succession to the throne, and the sister of his wife, we learn by a recent letter, have lately been offering their heathen sacrifice of pigs, chickens, and whiskey to the goddess Pele, who was supposed by the former Islanders to have her abode in the awful craters of Mauna Loa. The Masons of Michigan and the Canadian provinces have been assuming superior virtue, because they have cut off two or three "agnostics." But if Kalakaua were to visit us again they would embrace him on the five points, Ingersollism, heathenism and all. What say Drs. Thomas, Fallows, Lorimer, Quint, Locke, Perry, et id omne genus to their brother Kalakaua?

The Cathedral church of the Protestant Episcopal diocese, of which Chicago is the center and Bishop McLaren is the head, is located a few steps from the Cynosure office. It is an old building, erected "on the prairie" when there were comparatively few residences in the vicinity, and Mr. Carpenter's great property in the region was yet "a farm," so to speak. It is regarded as inclined to "high church" practices, and for a Methodist or Baptist service to be held within its walls would be certain desecration. None of the "sects" can ever expect to use it for their worship. The thought would arouse a holy horror; and for the Bishop to allow such a service would be worth his official head. Yet in spite of all the guards of tradition, and custom, and ritual, and decree, and reason, and dedication, and sanctity, Bishop McLaren opened the doors of his holy cathedral last Sabbath to a service as unholy as the Mormons'! It is a human propensity and failing for inferior men to try to imitate those who are in their esteem great. Thus a number of the secret orders, which have been humble because of their recent beginning and the poor estate of their members, are trying to vie with the toggery and parade of the wealthier Freemasons of the Knight Templar degree; just as a cobblar's wife apes the dress of the woman with a million, and the mission church vies with the temple on the boulevard. The Knights of Pythias, Odd-fellows, United Workmen, etc., have taken to drilling, and gauntlets, and swords, and chapeaux, and fuss and feathers generally, because, to their weak minds, the Knight Templars have nearly reached human perfection. And now, further to copy their model, the first-named of these orders has appointed a day for doing up its religion for the year. Last Sabbath five hundred of them marched with bands through the streets of Chicago for over a mile to Bishop McLaren's cathedral, and there had their worship, conducted by an imported minister—but of course an Episcopalian.

The French are preparing for their "South Sea bubble." A circular has been issued in France by the Panama Caual Company, intended to allay the apprehensions of stockholders, who have recently been assessed 125 francs a share. This circular announces that the final period of work on the canal will commence on Jan. 1st, and De Lesseps pronounces its completion in 1888. He promised at first to construct it for $110,000,000. With the utmost confidence in their great ditch-digger the French people subscribed liberally. Some facts that have come to light as the result of an investigation conducted in the interest of the French shareholders indicate that $100,000,000 has already been expended on the ditch; that not one-tenth of the canal is yet finished, and that at the present rate of cost and of progress it will take twenty-five years and a thousaud millions of dollars to complete the work. Lesseps's claim that the work will be done on time, aud at a cost not much in excess of his original estimate, naturally awakens a great deal of suspicion. Although less than oue-tenth of the excavation has been accomplished, thousands of lives have been lost and nearly the entire amount of the original subscription has vanished. If the French people can be induced to meet the enormous outlay, which seems to be inevitable if the canal is to be finished, it is certain that thousands of them will be ruiued, as no possible tonnage could make the canal profitable on such an investment. Naval officers who have recently arrived in Washington from Panama say that but six miles of excavation have been completed, leaving forty-one miles more to build, and the most serious part of the problem, the regulation of the water of the Chagres river, has not yet been solved. De Lesseps's circular is understood here to be a piece of deception to beguile ignorant stockholders into sinking more money in a hopeless undertaking. He has not yet the consent of the French government for his lottery scheme by which he promises to raise the needed funds, and if the investigation proceeds he probably never will. It is announced in Washington that the matter will come before our next Congress for examination also. It is thought that some two million dollars were sent to a French agent in America to use in Cougress to defeat the Nicaragua scheme of which General Grant was president.

THE HOLLANDERS OF THE REFORMED CHURCH.

THEIR REASONS AGAINST THE LODGE.

BY REV. WM. MOERDYK.

Why do we oppose secret, oath-bound societies?

1. Because we firmly believe that union with them tends to withdraw energies and influences from the church which rightly belong to her. These are God-given trusts. Should not the church be first in the hearts of her adherents? It is not a matter of abstract opinion, but one of experience, that a division of interests but causes to draw the heart away from life's highest duties. A prominient minister of the Reformed church volunteered the statement, derived from his personal experience iu his own charge, that a man devoted to the interests of secret societies is lost to the church. Should not this incite to a serious inquiry into relations which are so damaging to the one great cause?

2. The tendency of secret oath-bound societies is to satisfy men with a Christless religion. Statements by eminent, active Masous, which we have no reas o to doubt, testify as to the good promised from connection with the orders; things which, in the light of revealed truth, are only a delusion and a snare. To quote from Mackay (Ritualist, Art. Preparation, page 44) in reference to the secret order of Masonry: "Masonic Symbolism is intended to remind the candidate of his ignorance, which Masonry is to enlighten; of his evil nature, which Masonry is to purify; of the world, in whose obscurity he has been wandering, and from which Masonry is to rescue him." Are these and other similar statements meaningless, or are they intended to delude men from the ways of God's revealed truth.

3. The benevolence of said societies is of a character which it behooves every church member to examine well before he encourages it by his support. The scriptural idea of benevolence is as broad as the wants of suffering humanity. All are our neighbors. These societies inculcate a doctrine contrary to this. Their benevolence is circumscribed by the limits of their own organizations. They know no world except the one of their own circle. Is not every member of the visible body of Christ called upon to leap the bounds of all humanly instituted societies, and show by word and deed and example the glorious character of the Gospel of Christ? Its chief glory and its crown is its condescending and helping love to all classes of people. No man or society should be allowed to rob unprotested the church of her crown. "For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? Do not even the publicans the same?"

4. The oath which binds the members to secrecy is one which cannot be defended on scriptural grounds. The Bible is plain on this point. An oath to maintain the cause of truth in human society is allowed and inculcated in revealed truth. But an oath to keep secret voluntarily assumed relations which have no bearing upon the administration of justice and which often defeat the ends of justice before human tribunals is condemned by the plain letter of the law: "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain."

5. The secret oath-bound societies introduce practically a division in the church, and destroy, though not openly, the unity of the body of Christ. Who that is at all informed of the claims set up by these societies will deny that in many cases the interests of the lodge take preference to those of the church. The lodge is a power, which from its very spirit is feared in the church, because antagonistic to her prosperity. Reasons like the above might be multiplied. The presentation of them should result in earnest investigation of a subject which demands more than a passing thought from every member of the Christian church.

THE WAR FEVER IN GREECE.

ANDROS, Greece, via Syra, Oct. 16, 1885.

DEAR BRO. K.:—We think to write to you and tell you something of the condition of Greece just at this time. Farther back we told you that Greece might come into trouble with Bulgaria. But now we have to say that the trouble has already begun. It is some time since Bulgaria insulted Greece in different ways again and again. Now Bulgaria, about three weeks ago, made an attack against Turkey and took a state from her, which state Greece had hoped to take some day. Now Greece, seeing the progress which Bulgaria has made, thinks it is time to stop her from going any farther. But the question is that Greece has to go through Turkey to meet Bulgaria. Turkey is making preparations for war on one side to keep Greece from going through, and on the other side to keep Bulgaria from coming farther down. The Greek government has sent circulars around through Greece, on eight days' notice, that all the young men from 21 to 26 years old are to present themselves, and also for all from 26 to 31 to be ready to present themselves on a moment's notice.

We cannot express the sadness of these days. All the people are panic stricken. Fathers, mothers and wives are crying on every side. These few days are days of great lamentation. Whether Europe will leave Greece to fight with Bulgaria and Turkey only God knows. But we see that Greece was not so excited even in 1821, when she freed herself from the Turkish yoke, as she is now.

Now while we are writing, late in the night, the young men are about the streets, some singing, some crying, and some firing guns; for they leave their homes, but they do not know whether they will return or die in the war.

It may be that before you get this letter everything will change and become peaceable. Would to God that peace may come. But the time seems rather cloudy for Greece. Immediately the prices of everything were raised. The king was away in another part of Europe, and was telegraphed to come home immediately. He came and was received with great enthusiasm, and his short speech to the people was for war. He gives half of his salary toward the expenses of the war, and also the nation borrowed 26,000,000 francs immediately to get ready for the war. This is the condition of Greece; pray for her. Yours in Christian love,

A. D. ZARAPHONITHES.

HELL ANNIHILATED.

BY ELDER NATHAN CALLENDER.

A little time since I was showing the revised Bible to some gentlemen, among whom was a nervous old man of 70 years or more, who, with a trembling hand, seized the book, and anxiously turned to see if hell was in the revised text. Finding Hades in the place of hell he grew composed and joyful. Sure enough, thought he, the "great gulf fixed," is securely bridged.

That Hades does not necessarily designate the future eternal fate of the finally impenitent, is accepted as evidence quite adequate to establish the non-existence of a hell for such as reject the only way of salvation and eternal life. What arguments have been used on this effort to span the chasm ever yawning between the ungodly of earth, and the "saved from sin" in glory. Neither suspensions of older make, nor cantilevers could meet the emergency. Dives and Abraham's bosom are too "far off" from each other to make suspension structures possible. There is not half material enough in our solar system to construct one pier for the needed bridge,—the material universe is too small, all told, to make one safe tower of a bridge across this wide, yawning gulf. No angel could fly across it in a hundred ages. The infinite "Angel of the Covenant" did span the chasm for all who embrace and trust him. Jacob's ladder reaches all the way—long enough at both ends.

Report says that while a shrewd infidel (can infidels be shrewd?) was descanting on "no hell," a bloated debauchee—no exceptions in his auditory—anxiously exclaimed, "Bob, be sure ye're right, for piles of us are depending on ye?" Whether such a fact ever actually occurred or not, it is in the range of probabilities. We may fancy no-soulists, no-hellists, no-heavenists, materialists, vieing with each other, either to annihilate hell, or to build a bridge across the infinite abyss, yawning ever and eternally between the righteous and the wicked' To do this they must condemn Jesus as emphatically as did the Jews, then descant on the mistakes of the Moses of the Old, and true Moses of the New Testament. Then with the great "muck rake" of the infidel legions, they plunging to ocean's bottom to resurrect "monera" enough out of which to put a bridge clear across the infinite gulf! So-called scientists, including the Christian clergy, come to the aid and the fellowship of confirmed and pronounced infidels, and swell the cry, "liberal, advanced thought," "evolution hath found it!"

At first sight all this may seem foreign, and even random talk; but we must not forget that the strife of the ungodly is, and always has been, against Divine retribution. Though a sense of this is inborn with us, it is an unwelcome one, and ever and anon men combine to fight it off, though the battle overturn heaven itself. Yes, away with the idea of a future hell, "though the heavens fall," is involved in this unholy strife. Sooner than have "a pit for the wicked," as God, the triune One, teaches both in the book of nature and Revelation, let there be no personal God, i. e., no God, no anything worth the room it occupies. Thus saith Evolution. Animalism, materialism, run mad, will manufacture a first-class Dives; and Dives will continue to ignore retribution till brought face to face with it, when "in hell he lifts up his eyes, being in torment," he realizes the situation, and pleads, too late, for a remedy. The Christian clergy are accused of creating all the hell there is; but infidelity creates more hell-fire for both worlds than all the agencies combined, existing this side of the pit for the wicked. Animalism, materialism, infidelity run every single factory of the pit, today, from the politest gambling and drinking saloon, down to the foulest and deepest den that infests our sin-cursed world. How much infidelity with its multiform agencies enlarges hell, and how much faith in, and fidelity to God abates it, can never be known till the "Depart ye cursed" and the "Come ye blessed" shall be uttered from the burning throne of the great Judge of all the earth.

To the righteous, confiding soul, hell is annihilated by the sacrifice of the Son of God on the cross combined with the Christian ministry; while to the unbelieving and riotous rebel against Christ, hell is intensified and enlarged by every infidel act, from the least to the greatest. Sin made Satan and all other sinners, and sinners make the sinners' abyss. Hell is the aggregate of sin and of persistent sinners, God's great prison-house for all those who will not come to him and have life. Apostate men are ready to do anything but stop sinning and repent. They would sooner raze from its foundation the universe and convert the debris into a bridge to span the awful gulf, "count the atoning blood of the Covenant an unholy thing," rob Jehovah of his personal being, hurl the mansions and the crowns of the redeemed to nonentity, and their own being into animal ape-hood, than to pass up to mansions of the sanctified in God's chariot of life, to eternal glory.

STORY OF A KANSAS SUFFERER.

Not long ago in conversation with a lady who lived in Kansas during the "hard times," I remarked that I believed that God would always provide for our real wants in every time of need, if we fully trusted him. She quickly replied, "I know it, I know it," and then related the following, which I give in her own words as nearly as possible.

"During one of those hard seasons there, when everything had failed and our money was all gone, we came down to just corn meal thickened in water, and that without salt, on which we lived for about three weeks. There was a railroad town about three miles away and my husband would go every day trying to get work, but being a timid man and somewhat deaf, he was always crowded out. At last I told him we must starve. He said he would try once more. This time he was told if he would come real early in the morning they would give him work.

"Morning came; he started early without any breakfast, leaving the little that was left for the rest of us; but when he got there, and the managers learned that he was deaf, they said they were not allowed to hire him on the road as they were responsible for all accidents. When he came home and told me, my courage began to sink. I felt as though we must starve if God did not send us help. A neighbor sent to know if I would do her washing as she was sick. I was not well, being weak from hunger and nursing a young babe, but the thought of earning a quarter to buy bread nerved me to undertake it. So I left the last handful of meal for the children and went without eating any thing. When dinner time came I found my neighbor was but little better off than we were, and before the clothes were on the line I gave out and had to quit. When I started home my friend told me she was sorry to tell me she had no money to pay me. I was so weak I could scarce get home with my babe, and when in the house dropped down on the lounge crying, 'O God, send us help or we'll starve!'

"Soon a rap was heard at the door, and two gentlemen entered, one a physician and minister whom I knew. He asked how we were getting along, I told him bad enough. I broke down and began to cry, and said if God didn't send us help we must starve. 'God has sent you help, he has sent Gov. St. John here to help you,' he said, turning to the stranger.

"They had a buggy at the door loaded with provisions and carried in and loaded the table with every thing we needed. They said they would see that my husband got work, and they did so, offering to furnish more provisions; but my husband told them if he could get work that was all the help he asked. They helped others also.

"Gov. St. John took teams and went all over that country with supplies for the suffering. He lectured in town that night and told them it was a shame to let people starve right in their neighborhood; some who had been soldiers and fought for their country at that, and now let them starve because they had no money!"

"And that is the kind of a man that St. John is?" I asked.

"He was a good man then, I always shall believe; but they say he has turned out bad."

"Do you know that he did wrong?"

"No, only what the papers tell; and sometimes I tell my husband I don't believe it; am afraid it was told only to injure him politically. I shall always remember his kindness to us in our time of need."

This she told while the tears streamed down her face, and the simple story touched the hearts of those who listened, and we thought, no wonder St. John is willing to risk his all in trying to save his fellowmen from the depths of woe and drunkenness; it is because he has a human heart.

No, this great cry against St. John is raised, for one reason, because he accepted the votes of the American party, a party whose aim is to place all men free and equal on their own merits. May such men and such principles triumph. A. B.

SHERIFF GARLINGHOUSE OF CANANDAIGUA. JAIL.

A letter to the Geneva Advertiser dated Geneva, N. Y., Dec 31, 1883.

Not so many, now, know who Joseph Garlinghouse was. He was once a noted man in Ontario county. Of great natural shrewdness and sagacity, of untiring mental and physical energy, he had great power in the politics of the country. In the days of the Whig party, he was the trusted and consulted adviser of Granger, Sibley, Wooden, the Roses, the Doxes, Howell, and the other leaders of that party in Ontario, and the executor of their plans and purposes. In the party vocabulary of those days, "Joe, Jonas & Co.," were a firm of political workers who seldom met defeat. The "Joe" stood for Garlinghouse, the "Jonas" for Jonas M. Wheeler, of Canandaigua, and the "Co." for men in all the towns, of lesser ability and power.

The fame of Garlinghouse, for coolness, energy, good judgment, courage, and perseverance went beyond the county lines. And when the Morgan outrage so excited the people of Western New York, and many of those implicated in that transaction had fled beyond the Mississippi, Garlinghouse was selected by the Governor of this State to go to Arkansas and other States, with requisitions for the fugitives, and to bring them back for trial. This he accomplished as to some of them at least. In those days travelling was slow, on horseback, in stage coach or hired vehicles, and it was a travel of many days that Garlinghouse had with the persons whom he had in custody. He was a man of humor and cordiality, and ingratiated himself with them mightily and drew from them from time to time as they journeyed homeward, many of the incidents of that strange abduction of Morgan, and at last a revelation of his final fate.

The story as he told it to me is this: After Morgan was taken from the jail at Canandaigua, he was passed westward through Rochester, and over the Ridge Road to the Fort at Niagara River, where he was kept awhile. At last four men of the Masonic order received separately a behest, to go on a given night, at a given hour, to a vacant lot in the neighborhood of the fort, and to give a watchword to and receive another from whomsoever should be met there, by which each would know that he had met the other for a common purpose. They met accordingly. They received Morgan into their charge. They took him among them to the river bank. There were found two skiffs. Into one was placed Morgan with one end of a rope fastened about his neck, and two of the men got into the skiff with him. Into the other was placed a heavy stone, fastened to the other end of the rope that led from Morgan's neck. Into that skiff got the other two men. Both skiffs were rowed out into the river. At a signal, Morgan was thrown from one skiff, and the stone from the other, the stone dragging down the man. The skiffs were rowed back to the shore, and the four men separated, neither knowing who was either of the other three.

Such is the tale as told to me by Joseph Garlinghouse, when in 1862–63 he was janitor of the Chamber of the Senate of the State of New York. He was then an old man, inclined to be garrulous of the past, but of sound mind and in possession of his faculties.

MORAL REFORM AND REFORMERS.

Since man's first disobedience brought sin into the world, and death and all our woe, the work of moral reform has been called for at every period of human history, to cure the deep moral maladies of our race, to expose and remove the great wrongs that in every age and in every land have oppressed the souls and bodies of men, and have been so grievously destructive to human happiness. There is nothing more needful and more legitimate among men than the voice and work of reform; and of all reforms those that look to the moral ills and moral interests of men are the most needed, the truest, the noblest, and the most potent to meet the manifold, widespread and deep wants of mankind. Moral reform, in its truest sense, compreheuds, as its highest form, the work which religion proposes to accomplish on the earth.

It is not strange at all that the sincere and enlightened moral reformer feels and assumes that his office is clothed with a peculiar dignity and elevation, a sacredness and weight of right and authority which it can claim as it own, and to which reforms in pure politics, in science, in the development and application of the material resources and powers under man's control and employed in his service, can have no pretensions. * * * *

The high office of a true moral reformer should be borne and executed with wisdom; in a consciousness of its great obligations and its exalted aims; of the difficulties in its path, and, above all, of the purity of purpose and all the great qualities of mind and heart it demands on the part of him who assumes it before God and men. It is not every man who is called to be a prophet, above all, a royal leader in so holy a crusade.

Nowhere is the virtue of patience more necessary than in the advocate of a great moral or religious reform. The error, the wrong, the evil that is to be revealed to men and rooted up in such a case, is almost always deeply imbedded in the opinions and habits of men—consecrated often, as we have said, by many years,sometimes centuries or ages, of religious and legal sanction. The reform can not be thorough and effectual until the convictions, the conscience and will of men have been won to its justice and its support. This is not the work of an hour; what has taken years and centuries to grow, it will take more than a few years to remove from the minds and affections and the habits of men. He who has been so fortunate—to see the better light of truth, should be for himself profoundly grateful for what has thus been granted to him to see and to receive. But while he must not hide this light under a bushel, nor, in disobedience to the divine call, fail to "cry aloud and spare not" to show to wrongdoers their trangressions, and to the oppressed and wronged the treasures of liberty, of happiness and a better life that are their due, he must also, at the same time, understand what is just to those yet in the darkness of error and wrongdoing. It is often very difficult for such men to come promptly to the light and receive it. Be patient with them!—with these unfortunate victims of long-enduring darkness, of centuries of false teaching and evil training. Be never weary of teaching men;of giving them the light of better knowledge; of seeking to bring conviction to their minds; of winning their hearts to the radiant brightness, the beauty,the joy, the claims to obedience, of truth and righteousness. "Gain thy brother;" win men wherever you can by untiring, persistent, patient labor—the labor of love and hope. This patience is not always exercised by reformers, by the men engaged in great moral or religious movements; what we have had the good fortune to see, we feel and insist that all others must as promptly and as clearly see as ourselves. And yet the world does not so move, and a wise judgment of men does not allow us so to think and to demand. The experience of the long and richly historical past, as well as of the present, of our own times, does not justify such au expectation. God has wonderfully shown this long-suffering patience in his own dealings with men. It is a very marked characteristic of our Saviour's conduct with his generation. He was very patient with the ignorance, the slowness to understand, to believe and do, of the Jewish people, of "his own," to whom he came, to teach and to save them. He was wonderfully patient with the dullness of apprension of his own disciples—those of them, even, who were nearest to him.

"To whom our Lord has given grace"—

The true reformer should strive earnestly to purify his soul from intolerance—that odious sin that so very easily besets men who have assumed the work of discovering and rebuking and correcting the errors and sins of the world. The work of moral reform has certain dangers connected with it which are almost inseparable from it. One of the most common of these is this sin of intolerance. It is the peril, the weakness and vice of certain strong, positive, but ill-adjusted, ill-guarded, undisciplined natures. These have a strong instinct for reformatory enterprises. They have a powerful impulse within them to assail the sins of men, and a high regard for the supreme obligations of truth God-ward and man-ward, which leads them often and very easily, if not enlightened and softeued and sanctified by grace, to the extreme of self-righteousness and uncharitableness and intolerance. Many otherwise noble characters have been sadly darkened by giving play to this sad weakness.

The vice of intoleraunce—and it is a real sin—can not be too strongly condemned and too carefully guarded against in the advocates of reforms. It is manifested in several ways. First, against all who do not promptly accept our particular reformatory plea. These must all be denounced as "dishonest" men, as rebels against truth and light, to whom no mercy nor charity of judgement is to be shown. Their pretence of conscientious difference from the reformer is not to be allowed for a moment. Sincerity of convictions, uprightness of motives, conscience—all these are denied them; denunciation is all they deserve. Then the same intolerance is shown to fellow-reformers, men engaged really in the same field with the same purpose, but whose views do not altogether square with our own, and who work not exactly our way. No toleration, no fraternal appraciative charity and fellowship are to be granted to these; they "are not of us." This is certainly a very ugly spirit, wholly unworthy of lofty generous souls. To say that this is a spirit altogether uncharitable, is quite unneccessary. Every precept of the Gospel, every better instinct of a regenerated nature, the whole life of Jesus condemn it. Every great moral reform of our age has been darkened and injured by this spirit of intolerance.

It is a noble, divine virtue which leads us to respect the uprightness of purpose, the conscientiousness of conviction, the honest, and often very honorable, sensitive feelings, and the reputation of others. A brave advocacy of a just cause neither demands nor justifies a violation of this virtue. To urge men to fidelity to truth and right, is one thing, and it is a most holy office; inquisitorial intolerance toward others, a disregard of the justice due to their sincerity of motives, their worthy deeds, their good reputations,under the plea of a zealous devotion to truth,of service to God, is quite another thing. And it is with ungenerous, untutored, extravagant natures that this vice runs wildest riot; with such it not seldom becomes the very fanaticism of intolerance. C. L. L.

THE LORD'S DAY ON THE CONTINENT.

No desideratum of the social and religious world is now being more actively agitated in Central Europe than the project of a better observance of the Lord's day. It seems that the so-called "Continental Sunday" is doomed "to go;" and no friend of public and private morals will do other wise than rejoice that its day of doom appears to have come. For years an international association, organized for the purpose of educating public sentiment on this point, has been busily at work, with headquarters at Geneva, and by means of branch associations, publications, annual delegate meetings, petitions, and the like, has managed to keep the subject constantly before the public. The movement is just now assuming a new character, and is entering upon a new stage that promises some healthy results. The political authorities are beginning to recognize the agitation, and are taking active steps in the right direction. In various cantons of Switzerland—such as St. Gall, Berne, Aargau, and others—more stringeut laws have been enacted. In Austria such laws went into force a few months ago, and already good results are reported. Now the German goveruments have taken hold of the matter, and are trying to find out what to do in the premises. Prussia is leading in the movement. The Minister of Cultus has issued a circular letter to the presidents of the various provinces, directing a stricter obedience to the Sunday laws already in existence—namely, that, during the principle services Sunday morning and afteruoon, and also on the great church festivals, all work that could interrupt the devotions must cease, and promising that, in the near future, further laws would be passed by the government. The Imperial Government is takiug similar steps for the whole German Empire. During the past winter lively debates were held on the subject in the Reichstag, or Imperial Parliament, which gave occasion to many classes of the people to express their sentiments on this burning qucstion. These facts have influenced the governmeut to issue a circular letter to representative manufacturers and other "work-givers," and also to workmen, asking answers to the following questions: 1. Is Sunday work common in all branches of industry? 2. Is Sunday work the rule or the exception? 3. Is this work done (a) in the whole business, (b) for all the workmen, (c) for the whole Sunday or for a part? 4. What causes this work (a), technical reasons or (b) economic reasous? 5. What results would the forbidding of such work have (a) for the capitalist, (b) for the workingman, in regard to his income? Would this loss find a compensation in any gain? 6. Is it possible to carry out laws forbidding work on Sunday, (a) without any exceptions, (b) with what exceptions and for what reasons? The answers received to these questions by the government officials will have a great deal to do in shaping the proposed legal measures in regard to Sunday observauce to be introduced into the next German parliament.—Independent.

The annual catalogue of the Law Department of the University of Michigan is received. This is oue of the most popular law schools in the country, and is attended this year by 266 students. If this fine body of young men would combine to overthrow the ring rule of their fraternity and bring in a new era of simplified statutes and settlement of disputes without suits, they would reflect unwonted glory on the institution.

NOVEMBER THOUGHTS.

BY ALEXANDER THOMSON.

The dull November's sky is dark
With tempests that are yet to be,
But through the gloom of low'ring storms,
Father, I look to thee.

Above the clouds clear, shining day
Maintains its everlasting reign,
And mild-eyed moons look ever down
Upon the world of men.

Though honor here is seldom pure,
And love for love is not returned;
Though often like a coal of fire
Ingratitude has burned;

Though tempests sweep the trembling soul
Till like a landscape, cyclone-riven,
There seems no beauty on the earth,
No mercy in the heaven.

We thank thee, Father, ever then,
Thy holy covenant is sure;
And even in the wreck of worlds,
Forever shall endure.

And oh! when in our human hearts
The Spirit holds his glory reign,
How can our souls uneasy chafe
At any slight of men.

Our Father, King, Lord of our life,
By thee upheld—our pathway guide;
And make us like a blessing move
Among the ranks of pride.

The look unkind, the word severe,
The evil deed for good returned.
In thy love's flame, O living God,
Let all, let all be burned.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF REV. ADAM CROOKS.

I.—BY PRES. L. N. STRATTON OF WHEATON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

It is said that the Sphinx, looking with mute and stony gaze across the misty sands and centuries of Egypt, exhibits from a distance a finely formed head and features, but upon close inspection the stone shows many a flaw and seam. Not unlike this, to the distant observer, the life and character of Adam Crooks, but totally unlike it in the close inspection. To one who dwelt for a long time under the same roof, and occupied the same office, and had in charge many of the same interests, such were his life and conduct that it seems difficult to find a flaw in his character, or point to a case in which he was not a full-grown man.

He was confiding, his judgment cool, collected and good, so that many came to him with their privacies of burden and sorrow, and he gave them his counsel and consolation. He was a close observer of men and things, and read character and circumstances as most men would read a book. He came to his more weighty conclusions slowly, and when he reached an opinion it was usually correct. This Napoleonic method of studying character was observed in his movements. He saw circumstances and considered contingencies which others failed to observe, and marched up to victory at points and on occasions when many others would have slept or thought nothing about it. Of all his reading aside from the Word of God, he "read the signs of the times." He knew and felt the weight of infidel organizations in the land, and took great pains and made great outlays with tongue and pen, strength and means, to oppose them. He wrote an introduction to a work against Freemasonry and Odd-fellowship, and made an arraignment of secret fraternities, especially Freemasonry which is so clear and cogent that a defendant might as well think to stand before the mouth of a firing columbiad as before his arguments. After his arguments he concludes in the following characteristic style:

"The power we oppose is mighty. The peoples and princes of all provinces fall before it, as before the image of gold upon the plains of Dura. The populace have learned to list with silent awe and bated breath to its thundering laudations. It has superinduced its potent influence upon tongue and type, pulpit, press and platform, colleges, courts and congresses—every formative force in society—and thus well-nigh bound both church and state as with fetters of iron. There is no time to be lost in taking coward y counsel of unmanly fears. If this foe is mighty, truth is ALMIGHTY. Enough to know that our cause is just, and that immortal interests are involved. If we can innocently ignore Christ in prayer once, we can always. There is no neutral ground. We must take sides. To surrender Christ is virtually to surrender Christianity. In the name of all that is sacred in human destiny, these pages plead against a surrender so costly. For such a cause shall we plead in vain? Ministers of the Gospel, with the vows of God upon your souls, what do you say? Reader, the one question for you to settle is: WILL YOU AT ANY COST BE LOYAL TO JESUS CHRIST? He is appointed our final judge. If we deny him he will deny us. The verdicts of time are of little account. Be sure that your answer is such as the decisions of eternity will approbate. Heaven in mercy impart the grace needed, to fearlessly and by all legitimate means antagonize banded treason against the purity of the church, the integrity of the state, and the world's only Saviour."

Had he been a military man he would have been hard to conquer; but he was a general on the moral battle field and seldom knew defeat. He never leaped at conclusions. He often measured swords with the ablest leaders of heresy, but could never be drawn into ambush, nor strike a blow at a shadow. He never under-estimated the strength of an enemy, and if he found occasion to strike, those who knew him best would look for a blow of masterly power and execution.

He was always hopeful. He was never disheartened at a seeming failure. His face never grew long and gloomy at the seeming backward turn of the wheel of fortune. If an honest effort failed of its anticipated results, and covered other souls with clouds, it did not his, for he would say, "This is God's work; to do our best to save, the day is ours, results are with Him to whom the work belongs." This trait of hope, and a well-grounded fidelity, put every one in his company at ease. No such man ever sat down in despair, or sold out at half-price, or sought to shift his pain of heart to his stomach by a dose of ratsbane or stramonium. Labor was rest, pain was comfort, long midnight rides over rough roads, or through drenching rains, were to him trifles not worth mentioning the next day. To mortal fear he seemed a stranger, and, Spartan-like, he confronted physical suffering and braved even death itself to do the cause of truth a service. Whether surrounded by armed enemies in the South and dragged to loathsome prisons, or going to a distant church service, through difficulties, exposures and pains which would have turned back a man of less courage, he filled the measure of his duty and surpassed the expectation of his friends. This grew out of his unwavering Christian hope in Him who said, "I will never leave thee or forsake thee," and "All things work together for good to them that love God." He knew these were the words of God, and he depended upon them.

He was somewhat portly; his figure was straight; his height five feet eleven inches, and his weight from two hundred and five to two hundred and fifteen pounds. His eye was a bluish hazel, and his fine dark hair, by toil and age had turned to an iron grey. His long, full beard, his round, full face, his clear, intelligent countenance, his erect and manly from, his scrupulous neatness, short, quick step and well chosen words—all showed that character which made an impresson of his manly dignity and worth. A crowd of persons on the street or in a railway train would have the impression at once that a man of unusual ability was among them.

His habits were steady, his methods uniform, his course one day, or in one case of business or advice, all things being equal would indicate his course on the next day or occasion. He did not do things just as it happened. People would not say of a cause he was about to decide—"It will be just as it happens to strike him." But to the law and the testimony were his constant appeals made.

He never sought to put himself ahead. Men who found him seeking seclusion in a congregation, would urge him to the front. His voice was clear and deep. Few men could be so clearly heard in in large halls and amidst the rising tumult. His clear and measured utterances calmed every sound to silence but that of his own voice. His speeches and sermons on reform were perspicuous and cumulative, and were far in advance of the graded roads where public sentiment will travel for a quarter of a century or more. His mind was methodical, and his texts were his sermons in a nutshell. He preached about the truths wrapped up in the text, from notes carefully and logically arranged on slips of paper, and which, taken from his long pocket-book, would do credit to any homiletical journal published in the English language.

His articles for the press were written with a care which would stagger the credulity of every one save a most careful intellectual reader. Sheet after sheet would be written and re-written, until, when the manuscript left his hand for the printer, it was finished, and, as it is said of Gray's Elegy, no improvement in any particular could be suggested.

He led the Wesleyan Methodist connection through a season of the greatest rebellion and disintegration ever known in its history. Many of the founders and leaders of the denomination, supposing the work of the little anti-slavery, anti-secret, anti-rum church was ended, determined to lead the body entire into the Methodist Episcopal church. They held that our mission was ended. Adam Crooks was editor and publishing agent most of the period of this rebellion and the storm raged fierce and strong. He seemed raised up on purpose to meet the exegencies of the hour, and but few of our brethren have ever seemed to wish his memory to perish.

A small and beautiful edition of his biography, prepared in excellent taste by his wife, was issued, and the five hundred copies exhausted soon after leaving the bindery. It has been estimated that he was personally acquainted with from thirty to forty thousand people over whom he exercised a most salutary influence.

His home-life was as marked in its little amenities and tokens of affection, as were his acts in the more important obligations of private and public life. His wife was the worthy ideal of womanhood and of his affections. They were very much attached each to the other, and she was to him a true, capable, intellectual aid in all his self-sacrificing labors, which she cheerfully shared. They had no children.

While at home he had many duties and did much writing. He could not come home to visit long. After supper he would take his pen to write for a supply for some church, or for the encouragement of some who were desponding, to sympathize with the bereaved, to reprove in love, or to make peace among brethren. He was a peace-maker of rare and long-polished natural gifts. He spoke well of all whom he could, and was confided in by all parties. He made no brother's cause his own so far as to break friendship with an opposing brother. He felt that it is human to err, and divine to forgive, and knew the blessedness of being a peace-maker. He hated sin, but in Christ's stead loved the sinner.

For some ten years he annually visited the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, and Wisconsin, and repeatedly went to these or other States to attend dedications and meetings of reform like the National Christian Association. Often riding on freight trains or on a gravel car or with the engineer to make sure an engagement. He felt that the Lord helped him to do his work. In one letter to his wife he said, "There is nothing like being used to the rough and tumble of travel. You would have thought so could you have seen me riding all last night in a freight car, lying on a board for a bed and my satchel for a pillow." Is it any wonder that one who could do everything cheerfully for Jesus, should say as in his last same words to me, "My soul has been riding all night in a chariot of fire." And a little later when the heavenly train was halting for him, he said to his wife, with an intense look upon his face, "Be quick!" and nervously drawing her to him he said, "Be quick!" and pressing a fervent kiss upon her lips he said, "There is rest beyond the skies," and with this his spirit left its exhausted clay tenement and joined the company with the "chariot of fire" and soon entered the land of fadeless day. This occurred a little after noon, Tuesday, December 15th, 1874.

II.—BY JOHN THOMPSON, SABETHA, KANSAS.

I see in the Cynosure of Oct. 29th a request to persons to send for publication their own personal recollections of this great and good man.

I had the pleasure of forming his acquaintance in Senecaville, Guernsey Co., Ohio, in the year 1846 or '47. I was introduced to him by Rev. George Richey, at that time of Senecaville, now of Pataskala, Ohio. Both were at that time comparatively young men. It was, I believe, the first year of his ministry. Revs. G. Richey, A. Crooks and Samuel Thompson organized the Wesleyan church in that place.

Those were times that tried men's souls. One circumstance that took place at the organization I shall never forget, as long as memory serves me. My brother James and myself at that time were partners in a mill. Being very busy we had no time to change our working clothes before church began, and so went from the mill to church just as we were, all over flour. At the end of the sermon there was an opportunity offered for charter members—as the secret orders would call it. My brother rose in the back part of the house with his bearskin cap in hand, came to the front seat, and presented himself for membership. He was the only member for some little time. The M. E. people were watching with a jealous eye, laughing at him, wanting to know of him whom he would elect class leader.

Bros. Crooks and Richey preached for us some two years, built up quite a strong church in Senecaville, that remains to this day, a living and true witness for Jesus, unalloyed with secrecy and intemperance, proving the truthfulness of the Scriptures that "Blessed is the dead that die in the Lord, for they shall rest from their labors and their works do follow them."

The conference that sent Bros. Crooks and McBride to Grason county, North Carolina, was held that year in Senecaville, Ohio, near where the writer then lived. The mode of travel at that time in that country was on horseback. I had the care of the horses of these two brethren. At the close of the conference I saddled their horses, put on their old-fashioned saddle-bags, and bade them a sad farewell, almost confident that I never should see them again in this world. Neither have I. They have both gone on before, where no doubt they are singing hallelujas to God and the Lamb, who hath washed them in his own blood and made them kings and priests unto God forever and ever.

III.—BY EZRA A. COOK, CHICAGO.

Rev. Adam Crooks, the editor and publisher of the Wesleyan, was a whole-souled, genial Christian gentleman. An uncompromising foe of secretism, as well as of all other sins, and unsparing in his denunciation of hypocrisy and sham, yet he was so cheerful, even under adverse circumstances, that I delighted to be in his presence.

He seemed never to forget a favor. On one of his conference tours he stopped at my home in Chicago, sick. He ought to have rested a week, but it was impossible to detain him longer than for a night. We did what we could for him in the brief time he stayed, and by his earnest, cheerful piety and courage were as much refreshed as he was. Some canned cherries were particularly relished by him, and when he left he was persuaded to take a can along. I met him repeatedly afterwards, and I think he never failed to speak of his gratitude for those cherries.

He threw himself into the work of reform as if he loved the work as well as the reform. Was money needed at a convention, he had a most wonderful faculty of making it a privilege for those present to give, for he always gave as if he enjoyed it himself. "I haven't any money, but I will give 100 copies of "Masonry a Work of Darkness," said Bro. Wallace, its publisher. "And I will advertise your book in the Wesleyan free," answered Bro. Crooks, with a heartiness that made us all want to do our part.

The number of reform books that he would sell at a denominational conference was marvelous, especially as he represented and managed the other business interests of the denomination also most ably at these conferences. "Here is a book that cost the author his life—for twenty-five cents," he would exclaim, holding up a copy of Morgan's Exposition of Freemasonry, and a score respond, "I want one."

In his departure we lost a man of rare business ability, a forcible as well as a pleasing speaker, and a humble, conscientious, enlightened Christian.

BRO. LOGGAN PUSHING ON THE HOLY WAR.

Dear Cynosure:—Sabbath evening, Nov. 1st, I spoke to quite a good, and appreciative audience at the Berger school-house, on the religion of Freemasonry. I think there was no lodge element present; for all seemed pleasant and sociable at the close.

Next day I went to Clyde, where I had three appointments in the Presbyterian church. There is no anti-secrecy church organization in the town, or nearer than four miles; and but two consistent anti-secrecy men in the place or vicinity—Mr. N. Whitinger and H. Ince. Mr. J. Roop is seemingly a strong Anti-mason, but a member of the G. A. R., and thinks we could do more good to say nothing against the minor orders. I tried to show him that his foundation was sandy, and silenced him, in my presence at least. I visited the M. E. minister, Rev. Mr. Baker. I asked him what he thought of the anti-secrecy reform; but he said he did not feel it his duty to say anything on the subject, and he would not commit himself. Father Whitinger, who was with me, (and it was election day) asked him if he had voted the Prohibition ticket. He replied, "I guess I had better not say anything, for they would be down on me." "O! that my head were waters, and mine eyes a fountain of tears, that I might weep" for Zion, when she is imposed on by such cowardly, time-serving hirelings who flee when they see the wolf coming. He came out one night and heard me on the religion of Freemasonry, and when asked by one of his members what he thought of the lecture, he said, "Oh, he has given his attention to the subject and knows more about it than I do." He would not in any way commit himself. I trust the seed sown will bear fruit.

The last day I was at Clyde, I drove out to Ames station—about four miles, and visited the Wesleyan Methodist minister, Rev. Mr. Stilwell. I had a pleasant visit. He is heartily interested in the anti-secrecy reform work, and I left appointments for two lectures. Next I went to the Page school-house, but a continuous rain hindered the people from turning out; and rain, snow and wind hindered the next evening at the Join's school-house. Just got home to-day. Have six appointments for next week. More anon.

Nov. 12.—I closed a very well-attended series of lectures last night with good results, as expressed by a number of the best citizens, although it set the kettle to boiling; and some bubbles came to the surface to the disgust of the mass of the hearers.

I unveiled the fountain of idolatry from which Freemasonry flowed; and its connection with the church of Rome, from which, as Mackey says in his Lexicon, it received its speculative element, and which "now occupies it entirely to the exclusion of the operative;" thus showing its paternity to be Romanism and heathenism combined. I also spoke of its despotic and idolatrous character, showing its antagonism to republicanism and Christianity.

The second night I directed attention to the oaths or obligations, and some of the preparatory and monitorial ceremonies and instructions which were calculated and doubtless designed to degrade and unman the candidate, and to make him "tame and governable," (see Webb's Monitor, p. 33,) and make him both ashamed and afraid to tell what he had passed through; although they teach that in the funeral process he had been "regenerated," and had obtained "a claim to life everlasting." I also gave some of the teaching in the twenty-eighth degree, "Knights Adepts of the Eagle or Sun," the philosophical degree in which the infidelity of the order is taught with all plainness.

At the close the merchant of the place, Mr. West, asked what about the G. A. R. Before answering him I asked if he did not believe that the military army of these United States was the Grand Army of the Republic? and it choked him; he would not answer. I then said, the secret organization calling themselves the G. A. R. is not what they call themselves, it is a false name assumed for popularity.

Another man (without the gentle attached) said, "You don't know what you are talking about. If you did you'd keep your mouth shut." Three or four stamped a little, but the first speaker rose and said as I had spoken courteously I should be so treated. I then gave my views on the G. A. R. more at length, and there was quiet at the close.

The third evening I spoke on Odd-fellowship, Good Templars and the Grange; and when Bro. McConnel attempted to take up a collection, Mr. West rose and advised them not to give anything. This was getting down the lowest I ever witnessed, and it will be like to come down "upon his own pate." Some said, "I don't know about the Good Templars, but I do about the Grange, and he was right on that, and I expect he is on the Good Templars."

But I must close. I am to speak to-night at another school house. I expected to go farther east before this time, but there are so many openings I do not see how to get away yet. I have four appointments in Cloud county and two in Washington; and the Friend Quakers desire me to give them two or three lectures in their church, four miles north of Haddam.

MISSOURI STATE CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

The political meeting at Stanberry, Missouri, Nov. 11th, 1885, adjourned at one o'clock for one hour to give the friends opportunity to reorganize the Missouri State Christian Association opposed to secret societies. Rev. B. F. Miller was chosen chairman and M. N. Butler secretary pro tem. The election resulted as follows: Rev. B. F. Miller, Eagleville, president; Rev. A. D. Thomas, Avalon, secretary; vice-presidents: Revs. Wm. M. Love, Osceola; A. B. Lipp, Martinstown; I. W. Bears, Newpoint; and E. A. Rowly, Maryville; J. S. Wright, Mt. Moriah; J. M. Ferguson, Grant City.

Considerable discussion prevailed as to the relation of the religious and political work. The nomination and election of Elder R. Smith, of Maryville, as State agent and lecturer, led to not a little inquiry and debate as to the relation of this Association and its agent to the N. C. A. of Chicago. Motion that the clerk of the meeting report the election of officers to the Christian Cynosure prevailed.

DAYTON VISITED—A DEBATE ON ODD-FELLOWSHIP ON THE BILLS.

{ Office of the Conservator,
{ Dayton, O., Nov. 12, 1885.

Dear Cynosure:—I am now seated in the office of Rev. Wm. Dillon, a gentleman who has been for many years a pastor in the United Brethren church. He has recently started a paper, which bears this quotation at its head: "Remove not the ancient landmarks which thy fathers have set." This paper is intended especially for those who are endeavoring to maintain the rule of the United Brethren church in excluding lodge worshipers from their communion. We can recommend it as an able advocate of our principles.

Since I last wrote I have visited the cities of Xenia and Dayton, and the towns of Harrisburg, Clayton, Phillipsburg and Union. In all of these places I have found many warm friends.

At Xenia, father Patterson, though over four-score years of age, hitched his horse to the carriage and took me to see friends, who subscribed for the Cynosure, and will doubtless attend the State convention. I had hoped to have met Dr. Carson, president of the United Presbyterian Seminary located here; but found he was away from home. Many of the students of this institution gave me a cordial invitation to meet with them some Friday evening and represent our work. I hope to meet them to-morrow evening.

While passing along the street I chanced to meet a colored man, who said he was a member of a secret society. He said this society was organized to bury their brethren. I asked him if he was a member of any church. He replied that he was. I then asked which cost him most, his church, or the burying society. He answered, "The burying society."

At Dayton we made the acquaintance of many of those grand men who are nobly contending against the powers of darkness. Dr. Davis, though well advanced in years, is still advocating with untiring zeal those truths which have made his life a success. I can not describe my feelings as I talked with this father in Israel. Said he, "Bro. Stoddard, you cannot know the trials I am called to pass through. I feel like one from home. Many in the church of my choice are seeking to overthrow the principles which gave it birth. The liberal element in our church have proposed that I sit down with the young men and frame a constitution and confession of faith worth the attention of Christendom and the ages. Virtually asking me to overthrow those principles I have been endeavoring for the last fifty years to teach, and declare my life work a failure. They could not ask a more cruel thing." The Dr. will endeavor to attend the Columbus meeting and encourage us who are younger in the work. Revs. French and Dillon should be mentioned among those who will attend from Dayton.

On Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings we addressed large and attentive audiences in the Harrisburg church. There were at least two hundred and fifty persons present each evening. We never spoke in a place where the people turned out better. When we take into consideration that the farmers are all working hard to secure their corn, this is remarkable. Bro. John Rasor had made every prepperation for the meetings. I feel especially indebted to him for his assistance in securing Cynosure subscriptions.

On Tuesday evening I took occasion to speak somewhat upon Odd-fellowship, as I found there were a number of Odd-fellows in this section. Mr. Schaffer, a prominent member of this order, seemed to think I misrepresented their charity, and challenged me to a debate. Of course I at once accepted, and we drew up the following paper: "We, the undersigned, do hereby agree to meet in the Harrisburg church, on the evening of the fifth day of January, 1886, and debate the following question:

"Resolved, That Odd-fellowship is a charitable institution.
"We furthermore agree to use as authority the constitution and standard works of the order." Signed,
Aff., Millison Schaffer.
Neg., W. B. Stoddard.

I hope Mr. Schaffer will make the best preparations possible to defend this "glorious charitable institution." I hope to reach Columbus to spend the Sabbath, and shall start the first of the week for New Concord, Muskingum county, where Bro. Farris has a week's work waiting for me. The following delegates were appointed at the Harrisburg meeting: John Rasor, Rev. Y. Swank, Noah Swank, S. Hoffman, David Stoner, Christian Herr, and Rev. S. Lambert. Others will doubtless attend.

W. B. Stoddard.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MINISTERS THAT HINDER.

ST. PAUL, Minn., Nov. 7, 1885.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN CYNOSURE:—The leading Presbyterian church of the Northwest, (the "House of Hope,") has just called to its pastorate the Rev. Dr. R. Christie, late of Louisville, Ky., at a salary of $4,000. It is Dr. Christie's opinion that Rev. R. N. Countee, of the Tabernacle Baptist church of Memphis, ought not to be supported if he is opposing the the Masons or Odd-fellows. He thinks Freemasonry and Odd-fellowship are benevolent institutions. He does not believe that his life would be in danger were he to preach against them from his pulpit; but feels he would only excite their contempt and indignity by so doing (perhaps this is not his exact language, but it is the sense of it). Dr. Christie appears to be a very amiable, kind-hearted man, but is he so ignorant as to think Freemasonry and Odd-fellowship benevolent? He is a portly gentleman of fine appearance, and can preach a very smooth and beautiful sermon; and his church is the most influential of the Protestant English churches in the city. Does he want the brethren of the lodge pirates around his communion table, to go ahead, unmolested, and carry out their lodge obligations by shooting all who, like Bro. Countee, repent of their covenant with death and agreement with hell in the lodge, and make a public confession of their sins; and others against the lodge?

Has it come to pass that, "all tables are full of vomit and filthiness, so that there is no place clean," and the prophets do not know it? The time will come that all the lodge pirates will have to say, "We have made a covenant with death, and with hell we are at agreement. * * * we have made lies our refuge, and under falsehood have we hid ourselves." How literally the prophet's description applies to a Masonic lodge. Probably the prophet had in his mind the very abomination that the Freemasons revived at the Apple Tree Tavern in London in 1717, A. D. Is it not quite plain that if the lodge people will not allow God to disannul that covenant and overthrow that agreement by yielding to the Spirit of confession and repentance, that they will be found secreted under their falsehood and in their refuge of lies at the judgment day? And then they must reap the fruit of their iniquity in their "Grand Lodge Above" in the bottomless pit, "Eternally tiled in," as the lingo of the lodge expresses it. I have seen the dreadful agony in a Freemason's eyes as he writhed in the grip of the lodge serpent, "Silence and Secrecy," until the word of Christ set him free. Confession and repentance is a boon from God as priceless as the unspeakable gift of his Son Jesus Christ.

Oh, these hireling pastors do not realize how they are torturing the souls of their hearers of the secret lodge by refusing to testify against the power of Satan over their souls. They roll up iniquity, hide it away, and cover it up from the sight of men, but God sees it all and will bring it all to light at the judgment day. Then the righteous will be vindicated, and all the people will know that we have told the truth about the lodge.

Mr. Yandes was a member of the House of Hope church, but he was most thoroughly disgusted with a puerile pulpit that truckled to the infamous blasphemy of Freemasonry, and dared not rebuke it.

Yours truly, W. FENTON.

BOUND UP FOR THE JUDGMENT.

CLEARFIELD, Iowa.

"Behold I come quickly and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be," says the Lord in Rev. 22: 12. It is a question whether human instrumentality is to root up every plant our Heavenly Father hath not planted, or whether Christ is to destroy them by his personal appearance. Either way may be rightly termed the brightness of his coming. We cannot know the exact time when he will make his second advent. We know he will sometime, but how soon we do not know. We may expect him at any time. Every plant which our Heavenly Father hath not planted grows in the dark and cannot live in the light of the Son of God. You may plant seed in a shade and they will grow; remove the shade in the hot days of August and the plants will die. Before Christ comes again the tares which grow in the dark shade are to be bound in bundles.

Now there are many secret societies which grow in the dark, and the many different organizations are bound, each one by oaths and obligations as compact as bundles. That the many secret societies stand for as many bundles of tares it is easy to prove, and if the tares are already bound in bundles to be burned the end must be near. It is our duty to warn people not to be bound up in these bundles. The world may laugh at us and say we have a big job on our hands. If it was our business to save we would have a heavy task; but as it is, our duty is all that is required of us. Our arm is too short to save. We can only by the grace of God do our duty, then we will be clear. God is still extending his mercy, and whosoever will may come; but how soon Jesus may step down from the mediatorial throne no one knows. When he does there will be no more mercy; his eye will not pity. May God save us in Christ, then we will not be bound up with the tares, and we will love his appearing in reform work or in the clouds.

CYRUS SMITH.

HOLINESS TO THE LORD.

ENNIS, Texas, Oct. 23, 1885.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—I love your reform principles and think that you are doing a great deal of good. But there are two things I see in your columns which I very much deplore. Now I am your brother, and wish to say in brotherly love, that such subjects as these of which I complain should have no place in a paper which is published for the cause of Christ. I mean old war hobbies, such as your articles about Jeff. Davis and others who took part in the late war on the Southern side and the color line. I know that Radicals, both Northern and Southern, brought about the war. I have no sympathy for the one or the other, and about the colored people, I believe all Southern people are willing for them to have their legal rights; but to mix and mingle the two races they will not allow, nor is it right. Those who wish may enjoy eating and sleeping with the colored people, and also intermarry with them, but do not try to force others to do so, for we never will. Death is preferable to that. Yours in love,

W. H. RICHARDSON.

NOTE.—We print this brother's letter, title and all, as a matter of instruction. The late article on Jeff Davis was a simple vindication of history, which Davis has lately attempted to deny. There was no bitterness in it; but we are sorry, as Bro. Richardson should be, that men should commit such crimes against God and humanity as Davis has done. As for the colored people, we see thousands of white people almost daily who would be just as objectionable as associates. Christ died for the colored brethren as well as for us. There will be no separate apartment for them in the mansions of heaven. Genuine "holiness to the Lord" recognizes this fact, and Christ's law of love must settle all questions. A colored cook or waiter will not poison our victuals any the more if she sits down with us to eat them. —ED.

STUDIES IN THE KINGS AND PROPHETS.

LESSON IX. Nov. 29, 1885.—Hezekiah's prayer answered. —2 Kings 20: 1-17.

GOLDEN TEXT.—The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble. —Ps. 20: 1.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

COMMENTS ON THE LESSON BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. Love of life, so far from being wrong, is a duty. vs. 1–3. Hezekiah had come to the throne when the nation was at its lowest ebb, sunk in idolatry and oppressed by foreign foes. He had delivered his people from the Assyrian yoke, and not only inaugurated a great reform, but carried it through successfully. He had too much reason to fear that with his death they would relapse again into the old condition, and his desire to live longer was due in part to the natural feelings of a patriot. But it is also a Christian desire. The ancient pagan philosophy taught that a miserable existence had better be ended by one's own hand, and in consequence Greek and Roman history abounds with instances of suicide. True religion on the contrary makes life worth living, because it gives man an object for which to live. To undervalue existence, to part from it without regret is not Christianity,—it is stoicism; or worse still, a kind of spiritual selfishness which would enter rest before rest has been fairly earned. To be over anxious to quit our earthly service argues a lack of delight in that service.

2. The answered prayer. vs. 4–7. There is no separation between the doctrines of the Old and New Testament;—that is, we can never say of any divine truth, that it belongs to this or that particular age. Thus we see that "faith healing," as we call it, was known long before apostolic times, which leads us to infer that it has always been present in the world as a living, spiritual power, though rendered latent for long periods, by lack of belief. But to rely on prayer without the use of proper and reasonable means is to tempt God. True faith has always a basis of common sense. The natural and supernatural are never at variance. Our ignorance creates the seeming feud in this matter as in many others.

3. Great mercies do not save us from great errors. vs. 8–17. Hezekiah restored to life and favored with the most wonderful sign from God ever granted to man, would seem to be lifted on a plane above errors and mistakes. But there is a solemn lesson for us in the fact that the next thing recorded of this great and good man, is his lapse into gross pride and vainglory. Great gifts and distinguishing mercies call for especial watchfulness, without which they may only prove a snare.

LIGHT FROM THE WORD.

Of what is verse 5 an illustration? Ps. 103: 13. Is long life one of God's greatest blessings? Pr. 3: 2, 16; Ps. 91: 16. How should we feel in reference to its shortness? Ps. 90: 12.

"Was Hezekiah sick unto death." God sends illness upon the good, not in punishment for sins past, but as a trial of their faith and patience (Rom. 5: 3).—Lange. Prof. Birks thinks that this sickness occurred "very soon after the sudden overthrow of the Assyrians, and was an unexpected lesson of weakness and mortality in the very hour of exultation, when he incurred the great danger of secret pride."

"The prophet Isaiah." The leading prophet of Hezekiah's reign, and author of the Book of Isaiah.

"Came to him." There is no species of cruelty greater than to suffer a friend to lie on a dying bed under a delusion. There is no sin more aggravated than that of designedly deceiving a dying man, and flattering him with the hope of recovery when there is a moral certainty that he will not, cannot recover. And there is evidently no danger to be apprehended from communicating to the sick their true condition. It should be done tenderly, and with affection; but it should be done faithfully. I have had many opportunities of witnessing the effect of apprising the sick of their situation, and of the moral certainty that they must die. And I cannot now recall an instance in which the announcement has had an unhappy effect on the disease. Often, on the contrary, the effect is to calm the mind, and lead the dying to look up to God, and peacefully repose on him. And the effect of that is always salutary. Nothing is more favorable for a recovery than a peaceful, calm, heavenly submission to God; and the repose and quiet which physicians so much desire their patients to possess, is often best obtained by securing confidence in God, and a calm resignation to his will.—Barnes.

"I have walked before thee . . . with a perfect heart.' Though, as a man, he might be deeply conscious of imperfection, yet, as a king, his influence had been wholly on the side of religion, and he had not declined from the ways of God.—Barnes.

"Behold, I will heal thee." Means were used (ver. 7), but the healing was God's direct gift. Who can tell but that he often thus spares useful lives when worn down with toil, and when the frame is apparently sinking to the grave, in answer to prayers? He may direct to remedies which had not before occurred; or he may himself give a sudden and unlooked-for turn to the disease, and restore the sufferer to health.—Barnes.

"A lump of figs." It is usual in the East, even at the present day, to employ a poultice of figs as a remedy for ordinary boils. But such a remedy would not naturally cure a dangerous tumor or carbuncle. Thus the means used in this miracle may be compared with those adopted by Elisha when he raised the Shunammite's child (2 Kings 4: 34), or by our Lord when he satisfied the hunger of the multitudes, means having a tendency towards the result wrought by them, but insufficient of themselves to produce that result.—Cook.

"What shall be the sign?" Asking for a sign is a pious or a wicked act according to the spirit in which it is done. No blame is attached to the requests of Gideon (Judg. 6: 17, 37, 39), or to this of Hezekiah, because they were real wishes of the heart expressed humbly. The "evil generation" that "sought for a sign" in our Lord's days, did not really want one, but made the demand captiously, neither expecting nor wishing that it should be granted.—Cook.

"Let the shadow return backward." The retrograde movement of the shadow upon the sun-dial indicated that Hezekiah's life, which had already arrived at its close by natural means, was to be put back by a miracle of divine omnipotence, so that it might continue for another series of years.—Keil.

THE SIN OF THIS DISPLAY. God, from whom nothing is hid, saw in his joy (1) ingratitude, because he was unmindful of the distress which lately pressed him down; (2) pride, that he sought to gain reputation by magnificence and riches. But (3) his chief fault was ambition, which almost entirely banishes the fear of God from the hearts of men.—Calvin. (4) It was seeking an alliance with the world, heathen idolatries, contrary to the frequent warnings of God through the prophets. Hence (5) it was a failure in faith and obedience.—Peloubet.

Gunpowder is the emblem of political revenge, for it biteth first, and barketh afterwards; the bullet being at the mark before the report is heard, so that it maketh no noise, not by the way of warning, but of triumph.—Fuller.

OBITUARY.

MR. JAMES W. YANDES died at his residence in St. Paul, on Friday, October 30th, at the age of 68. He was in the enjoyment of his usual health on Monday morning, but on that day was stricken down with paralysis and died from its effects on Friday following. Mr. Yandes was of one of the most influential families of Indianapolis, from which city he came to reside in St. Paul about twenty-five years ago. Although not in public life he took a deep interest in public matters; and he was a man of strong character and positive convictions. As soon as the subject of secret societies was fairly before his mind he saw at a glance their antagonism to all the best interests of social, political, and religious life, and he was ever after a consistent Anti-mason. Those who knew him best will regret his loss the most. He was liberal in his benefactions to the church and to what he thought was right. But his knowledge of the power for evil of Freemasonry, Odd-fellowship, and such like institutions in church matters did much to abate his zeal in behalf of churches and ministers. He was buried on Monday beside his wife, on his own private grounds. He was a subscriber to the Christian Cynosure and had a high appreciation of its worth.

F.

ANN ELIZA JENKS, wife of Jesse A. Jenks, died at her home in Cheshire, Berkshire county, Massachusetts, October 23d, 1885, aged 71 years.

Mrs. Jenks was born February 13th, 1814, in the town of Norway, Herkimer county, New York. Experienced religion in 1831, and ever found it a precious treasure through life. She was an earnest Christian and an active worker in her Master's vineyard and died in the faith. Her funeral was largely attended at the Methodist church, of which she was a highly esteemed member until some few years ago, when a preacher was stationed in the place, who was a Freemason, named Haff. As she was strongly opposed to Masonry, she could not allow herself to hear him preach or give him any thing for his support. The result was Haff took her name from the church book. But still she trusted in the Lord and served him faithfully.

She acted as agent for the Cynosure for a number of years, getting a club of ten or more every year, and sending papers to many people far and near where she thought they might be the means of doing some good and advancing the cause of reform.

She selected the text for her funeral sermon from Paul's second epistle to Timothy 4: 18: "And the Lord shall deliver me from every evil work, and will preserve me unto his heavenly kingdom: to whom be glory forever and ever. Amen." The pastor gave us quite a history of St. Paul, but made no application of the text to the life and belief of the one who selected it for him. In his remarks relative to her he said: "Perhaps she was like to many professing Christians, having her peculiarities and making too much of one or two things. (Referring to her hatred of Masonry and its kindred evils, without doubt.)

Her last words written to me were, "I want every hungry soul to seek the pearl of great price, be true living Christians, and walk the precious narrow way." It may truly be said of her as of one of old, "She hath done what she could."

D. J. PRINCE.

[From another friend.]

In accordance with a request made a short time before her death I send you the following notice:

Mrs. Jenks was a member of the M. E. church, and an active Christian, though during a long illness she was unable to attend public worship. She looked upon Masonry as the greatest error of the age, and her dearest wish was to see the monster hurled from the hearts of men.

The funeral sermon was preached by Rev. Mr. Davies of Adams. The text was chosen at her request from 2 Tim. 4: 16–18.

While many who profess allegiance to the King of Heaven sat smiling grimly at her, this soldier of the Cross carried her standard bravely forward at the Divine command, till she has reached Immanuel's land, where it shall be said unto her, "Well done, good and faithful servant: enter thou into the joy of the Lord."

AMERICAN PLATFORM.

ADOPTED AT CHICAGO, JUNE 20, 1884.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled condition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clannishness by which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile bands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruption, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; and having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and believing the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, both inevitable and indispensable:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, believing with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; believing in the Christian marriage, and not in Mormonism; believing in the religious democracy of the New Testament, and not in the despotism of the lodge; believing, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, not in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we abhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscience by human laws and penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly believe that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike foes to human liberty and welfare. We further most firmly believe that a government without God has none but lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a mere usurpation, we regard all religions and worships invented by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as mere swindling impositions and cheats. We believe in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly believe that the bravery and blood of our soldiers have bought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will be just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised by the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon be not only echoed by their voices, but sustained by their votes.

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following, as containing a brief synopsis of the principles of our government, by which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.
2. That the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.
3. That God requires, and man needs a Sabbath.
4. We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.
5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.
6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to benefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.
7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punishment of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.
8. We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage.
9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be preserved inviolate, and the same equality should be extended to Indians and Chinamen.
10. That international differences should be settled by arbitration.
11. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.
12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.
13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.
14. That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.
15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

The Christian Cynosure.

EDITORS.

J. BLANCHARD. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1885.

THE PRESENT NUMBER OF THE Cynosure, though it fails to meet the desire of the editors in the number of contributors to the Personal Recollections of ADAM CROOKS, is otherwise a paper that we regard with some satisfaction. Many friends will receive this as a sample number. They are earnestly requested to read carefully and follow the bidding of their convictions in sending on a year's subscription, or getting a friend or neighbor to do so. Besides a valuable table of Masonic statistics next week there will be an able article from the pen of an esteemed Lutheran pastor on the Grand Army of the Republic, which will show the result of original and thorough investigation. We can promise also something entertaining for Thanksgiving day for our little readers—and great ones too. It is a good time to subscribe for the Cynosure any day of the year. Why should not your neighbor be reading it also?

Words not followed by consistent action, lose their force. Hence all those thousands who say they are opposed to secret societies, and speak against them when convening with those who are opposed to them, but take no action, attend no meeting, pay nothing, enforce no discipline against them; these will have a terrible account at last.

"Ye knew your duty but ye did it not."—POLLOCK.

An "Inter-denominational Church Congress" on the menace of cities to the Republic is called to meet in Cincinnati, December 7–11. Converting the sworn disloyalists in cities while ignoring their secret oaths, is like converting secession regiments by missionaries preaching the United States Constitution to them, but saying nothing of their rebellion.

ADAM CROOKS.

The noblest Roman of them all.

—Shakspere.

The furnace-blast which re-forged our American Republic and consumed its dross, purified its gold: and the man whose portrait looks on our readers today, was "fine gold tried in the fire." He began his ministry when twenty years of age, with a poor little colored church in Erie, Pa., the "least" and lowest of Christ's human brethren, when those who associated with negroes shared their social ostracism and popular contempt.

When, as they soon did, white people began to covet his preaching, his conference sent him 650 miles across the country into North Carolina, where the Friend Quakers had divorced slavery from Christianity, and a Methodist conference had refused to go with the South, when that denomination was split by the case of a fair-spoken bishop, (Andrews) who had married slave property and held it in violation of its rules. Slavery took care to save itself in both ends of the split; as it had already done with the Presbyterians and Baptists. The radical anti-slavery Methodists came off and organized as Wesleyans. They held their first denominational meeting in the sixth Presbyterian church, Cincinnati, of which the writer was then pastor. This was March 19th, 1843. And the address delivered by Rev. Edward Smith at that time, in the present Cynosure editor's pulpit, was published by Friends, and circulated in North Carolina, which opened the way for the mission of Rev. Mr. Crooks. His work grew rapidly, and he was soon followed by Bacon and McBride. They were persecuted. McBride was driven off, and Crooks was seized and dragged from his pulpit by four men, in a crowd of seventy-five, some of whom were Methodist preachers; cast into jail; released and driven North by men who sought his life. Eighty thousand dollars worth of slaves were manumitted and sent North; and North Carolina was the last State to go into secession and rebellion. Multitudes of the noble men, who had learned to hate slavery and love the Union, fled to the mountains in time of the war, and were hunted with bloodhounds to compel them to enlist.

Mr. Crooks and the Wesleyans protested, not only against slavery in the Methodist Episcopal church, but against the absolute appointing power of the bishops; the exclusion of its lay members from equality in the government, making it an ecclesiastical despotism; against three orders of ministers, instead of one equal brotherhood; against their denial of the right of the local church to manage its own concerns, and the choice of their own ministers; against a color line, separating the African Methodist from the American;—in brief, the Wesleyans undertook to fashion their church entirely "after the pattern shown them in the mount" of God's Word. More material still, they excluded the sellers of liquor, and the minions of the lodge, which the Methodist Episcopal church had ceased to do; as it had ceased to exclude the buyers and sellers of men.

MR. CROOKS AS EDITOR.

One year after Mr. Lincoln's proclamation freeing the slaves, while yet the war was raging, Mr. Crooks was chosen by his conference editor of the Wesleyan. The slave system fell; and, Lee, Prindle, McEldowney, and Matlock, recognized Wesleyan leaders, went back into the old church; and Mc Eldowney took the ground that those who refused to follow them were guilty of the sin of schism. The excitement was intense, and Mr. Crooks's editorial labors began in this furious whirlwind. He looked steadily to Christ and "the storm became a calm unto him." Was he right? We answer, undoubtedly.

There is not a sect or denomination of Christians on earth which has not come off from another. The Christians separated from the Jews; Rome from Carthage, Alexandria, and Antioch, and her bishops revolted against their lawful sovereign, the Greek Emperor. England and the Germans and Scandinavians withdrew from Rome, following Knox and Luther; and a multitude of sub-sects have withdrawn from each of the above. So that if separation is necessarily unlawful schism, there is not a lawful church on the globe. Leaving an impure, to unite with a pure church is not going out of the church, as going from a dirty room into a clean one is not quitting the house. Schism is forsaking a church without sufficient and justifying reasons. A church covenant is mutual; the church agreeing to walk in the ordinances of God, and the members agreeing to walk with the church; not perfectly, for nothing human is perfect. But if a church allows fundamental immoralities, or false worships, it justifies the protesting member in leaving it; as drunkenness, or commanding sin exhonerates a child from obedience to the parent, so far forth as the disqualification or sinful command extends. If either becomes permanent, the child is free. He must obey God rather than man. He must not steal, rob, murder, or practice idolatry to please his father.

Now the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal church censured George Storrs and Orange Scott in 1836, for attending and praying at an anti-slavery meeting; and continued that censure thirty-two years, the whole church acquiescing. In 1868, when they repealed the censure, the resolution assigned as their motive, "the honor of the church;" that is to say, they condemned two good ministers for a Christian act, to avoid unpopularity with slaveholders and their friends; and thirty-two years later, after the good men were dead they rescinded the unjust condemnation for the same cause, viz., worldly popularity! Now in this, the Conference and the whole church which endorsed them turned away their ear from hearing the law: and "He that turneth away his ear from hearing the law, his prayer shall be an abomination." Pursuing the same evil course, Crooks, McBride, and Bacon were hounded, imprisoned and their lives threatened and attempted, by Methodist preachers and class leaders among others, for preaching the original doctrines of the Methodist church, and circulating a tract called "The Ten Commandments." And the Methodist Episcopal church, neither then nor since, has raised a voice against it, or against slave-holding, selling, etc.

But besides setting at naught all the foundations of law and morals, the Methodist Episcopal church has admitted, and endorsed by its silence, a multitude of false worships, which is against the plain and positive commands of God, in the Old Testament and the New. The apostle expressly declares worshiping God without Christ to be Gentile worship or

THE WORSHIP OF DEVILS. 1 COR. 10: 20, 21.

And lodge worship is such worship.

These secret worships are declared by, made and intended for the masses, irrespective of Christianity; for Jews, deists, Mohammedans, and pagans, necessarily exclude Christ. Nor is it possible to combine and practice both kinds of worship. Paul is explicit—"Ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table and the table of devils."

Mr. Crooks, led by the spirit of truth, once having been put out of this fearful mixture, by the hands of a North Carolina sheriff, by no act of his own, it would have been sin for him to have gone back to break bread with the worshipers of Baal. But, as editor, he allowed full and free discussion in the church organ. But excepting a few prominent leaders, and a handful of their followers, the Wesleyans decided to stand by their principles, and remain together.

Mr. Crooks was appointed agent as well as editor, and, by wisdom, self-denial, and almost superhuman exertions on his part, and industry and liberality on the part of the members, a fine church and printing house were built and paid for at the head quarters in the city of Syracuse. And when American principles shall have triumphed; when the dark system of lodges, which now sends up its murky miasms from one border of Christian civilization to the other, shall be where the war which it organized now is, among the things of the past, the name of ADAM CROOKS will be written in shining characters on the flag of "the new heavens and new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness," among that innumerable multitude who in all things have "given Christ the pre-eminence." And when the reform which the Wesleyans advocate shall have swept from the visible church everything not commanded of God; there will be but "one Lord, one faith, one baptism;" the Lord's Prayer will be answered, his "kingdom come," and fact and right become one.

CHURCH IDOLATRY.

Bishop N. Castle was once a reformer. So was Solomon. But the use of power slowly corrupted him. He began to prefer his Palestine kingdom, to the kingdom of the Infinite God, which is "righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." "And Solomon loved the Lord, walking in the statutes of David his father, only he sacrificed and burnt incense in high places;" Kings 2: 3. Now these high places were lodges. Bishop Warburton, in his "Divine Legation of Moses," says, "Every God had his secret worship to which none were admitted but the initiated." Solomon loved and worshiped Jehovah, but allowed both kinds; and the false worship ran down the true, so that soon after his death the whole nation worshiped idols; and ten tribes (States) sank out of history.

The Kansas Conference, Bishop Castle presiding, lately resolved,

"2. That we look with disapprobation upon any movement anywhere in this church which tends to dissuade our people from giving their hearty support, financially and in every other way, to the general interests of the church.

3. That whether with or without law, it will be an auspicious hour for the kingdom of our God when Christian men and women in all our land shall see the evils of secrecy in its various forms, and shall separate therefrom for Christ's sake."

That is to say, Bishop Castle will rejoice if Christ is worshiped; but the church must be supported whatever worship prevails in it. This is a caution to Floyd, Dillon, Davis & Co., and this spirit will run Christ's religion out of the U. B. church unless God sends a Hezekiah, Josiah, or Asa; perhaps a Jehu.

"BETWEEN TWO OPINIONS."

The National Christian Association has just issued a finely executed volume of 389 pages, with the above title, from the pen of Miss E. E. Flagg, of Wellesley, Massachusetts. This young lady has written several small books already, all of which have been good, and some have drawn prizes. Hers is one of those intense natures which always yield important results. Her mind was early fixed on foreign missions; but the providence of God set distinctly before her mind the secret lodge system, spreading over this country and Europe, as an outburst of pagan, idolatrous worship, transferring itself into the Christian countries; its names and forms changed, while its nature and results remain the same—priestism, unmixed despotism, secrecy, lying legends, cruelty and lust. Miss Flagg was not an heiress, and her pen had begun to give her an income. She dropped the thought of going to pagan lands when she saw paganism coming to us; and, without looking for income or reward, she set herself to enlighten and move the American mind against the lodge. She began to write for a handful, but that handful has increased. Mr. Graham's book, "In the Coils," the papers say, has sold beyond any other book issued within the United Presbyterian church; and if, as we think it will, Miss Flagg's present book shall be purchased and read by all whose minds have already been roused by the anti-secret discussion, she will achieve a magnificent success.

Horace says, "It is difficult to speak common things eloquently." Yet this is precisely what Miss Flagg has done. She has held up "common people" both as "patterns to imitate and examples to deter." She does not present counts, lords and dukes, or even aristocratic slave-holders, to be wondered at and admired, but just what we meet with all around us in every-day life—saints to copy and serpents to shun; not imaginary but real saints, and aetual serpents.

Nor does her book come unheralded. It has been read as a serial, and has many admirers in advance. But a good story, broken into parts, is like a comely face painted on separate pieces of canvass: an eye on one, a cheek on another, and nose, chin and eyebrows on others still. We have just taken up this book to congratulate our readers on its arrival. We shall now sit down to it as a child to a kaleidoscope, knowing that we shall be pleased, but sure to be pleased much better than we know; and not pleased only, but profited, instructed and exhilerated at her slaughter of the sly, cruel and remorseless foes of our country; as when one reads the story of Mrs. Dustin, who tomahawked and brought away the scalps of the Indians who invaded her New England home, murdered her infant child, and dragged the mother captive into the forest by the Merrimac river, where the spot still awaits a monument of her wonderful achievement, whose story thrills us still.

SOUTHERN LODGERY.

The visit and address of Rev. C. S. Harris, at Wheaton, was interesting and important because of the imformation he was able to give of the secret orders among the colored people of the South. This brother is pastor of a colored Congregational church in Jackson, Miss., and is well acquainted at Selma, Mobile and Memphis. He has been twenty years a pastor and teacher, much of the time in the employ of the American Missionary Association, and has been a member of the Masons, Odd-fellows, Immaculates, etc., holding among the former the offices of Grand Lecturer and Deputy Grand Master

The societies came in among the blacks through the Union League which was widely organized by politicians,as may be seen in Judge Tourjee's"Fool's Errand." The blacks thought they must belong to this society to be free, and drifted from that to a multitude of other orders. The influence of some Northern ministers was even used to get them to become Masons, etc. He was thus led to join the Masons in 1871, and went into others, but found that they interfered with his religious duties, and he could not keep up both. He bravely and honestly decided to quit the lodge altogether; and did so.

In Mississippi he knew of these societies: Masons, Odd-fellows, Knights of Pythias, Independent Order of Sons and Daughters of Jacob, do. of Zion, do. of Adam, Benevolent Society No. 1, do. No. 2, Sons and Daughters of Ham, True Reformers No. 1 and 2, Good Templars, Immaculates, Knights of Wise Men, Brothers and Sisters of Love and Charity.

The Knights of Wise Men alone raised in five years $97,000 insurance money, not including dues. After them the Immaculates raised $87,000 insurance fund.

The lodge rooms were always finely furnished with chairs, tables, carpets, but the school-houses were dilapidated and neglected—not one was sustained by the colored people. The churches were also much neglected. Lodge meetings were held all the week and no place left for religious meetings.

He was not personally acquainted with Bro. Countee, of Memphis, but knew of him by corespondence and through others. A Baptist minister told him that Countee ought to be shot; that was evidence to him that Countee was a good man. Two-thirds of the ministers in the Baptist and Methodist churches were members of the lodges. He narrated some of his own experiences with the lodges which were wonderful, showing not only his moral courage, but that firmness and independence in the pulpit would under God yet save the colored churches from the lodge.

There was a collection of $16 taken for Bro. Countee, and $12.50 given to Bro. Harris.

Bro. Harris attended the Congregational ministers' meeting in this city and addressed them on the same subject as Rev. A. J. Bailey reports to the American. He told them among other things:

"The Masons say that no slave can become a Mason: and they claim that the first colored lodges were organized by slaves and hence were clandestine. And as every lodge of colored Masons has been organized by representatives from the first lodges, they were all clandestine.

"I knew one man who was hung to a tree because it was claimed that he had revealed some of the secrets of the lodge. He was left to die but was cut down by a friend. Another man refused to let his wife attend a lodge to which both men and women belonged. Complaint was made against him. He withdrew from the lodge. He was taken to a tree and hung, but was cut down before he died."

—In the Secret empire department next week we hope to print an array of Masonic statistics which will be of great value to Anti-masons. Every reader of the Cynosure is requested to send in any item or article that will be of value in making up the record of the secret orders.

—The United States Commissioner to Alaska reports concerning the needs and character of the people in that peninsula. An increased appropriation for schools is asked for. The children are said to manifest more than an average aptitude in study, and the Aleuts are especially anxious for the establishment of English schools. A careful estimate of the population of southeastern Alaska places the number of whites at 1,900 and the natives at 7,000. The native Alaskans are said to be educated to some extent in the elementary branches, and to be members of the Greek, Presbyterian, and Roman Catholic churches. They are not Indians and differ in appearance, habit, language and other respects from the Indians of the United States.

—A grand new Music Hall or People's Tabernacle" has just been completed in Cleveland, Ohio, by the generosity of Mr. W. H. Doane. It was dedicated on Sabbath, the 8th inst., to the service of God and presented to the people. A grand Gospel temperance meeting was held on the evening of the same day by the W. C. T. U. and Francis Murphy. The place is designed for a rallying place for noted evangelists and for all other moral reformers. It has a seating capacity for 5,000, is well appointed in every respect. What a place this would be to hold the proposed Church Congress against the lodge!

In New England, where Thanksgiving Day originated, as did many other excellent customs, it is suggested that on the approaching Thanksgiving Day ministers should preach on the family, the divine laws by which its purity is guarded, the dangers by which it is menaced, and the precious interests involved in the issue. There is an appropriateness of the theme to the domestic character of the Thanksgiving observance. It is a subject on which there should be "line upon line, precept upon precept."

A PLEA FOR THE ARMENIANS.

In the midst of the Mohammedans Providence has placed an old Christian nation, composed of 5,000,000 people, whose ancient history and early acceptance of Christianity is worthy of regard. While many ancient nations ceased their existence, leaving their names on the dry pages of history,this nation has kept its place amid the violence and revolutions of the world. The ancient zeal of the Armenians for Christianity is prominent to all those who are acquainted with their history. I will confine myself to one instance. Persians, whom you all know, are worshippers of fire. In the 5th century, A. D., they urged Armenians to accept their religion, but Armenians refused their proposal. Upon this the Persians declared war against them, and the two nations began to fight. The priest and the King were present on the battle-field, the former lifting up the brilliant cross as a banner of victory, and the latter encourging the soldiers to fight for the cause of the Lamb. Thus they overcame the Persians and established the spirit of Christianity in power, and we are told that beginning at that time they have sent missionaries to the heathen land.

Now a question meets us, why God does preserve such a small Christian nation amid the Mohammedans, who do not recognize the Blessed Trinity, and believe the false Prophet. What is his design? The answer is short and prompt. To raise up missionaries from her people and evangelize the whole of Turkey. No matter what others think, I sincerely and positively do believe it. Yes, the time will come that Armenians will send ministers to them to reap the harvest; and who knows whether that glorious day is not at hand? The time is near when the power of the Prophet shall be weakened. Their minarets with their half-moon, which now are towering against the sky, will be overthrown; and instead of them, the steeples of magnificent churches will be erected for the glory of the Lamb.

While this I believe, I entreat you, dear brethren, to encourage the work already begun among them. Believe me your work will not be in vain. If you do not see the result now, your children will see and speak gently over your tombs of the glad tidings. Bear patiently their mistakes, hear sincerely their petitions who sometimes are presented you; they truly desire the progress of the church. They plan those things essential for the groweth of the kingdom of peace. Though they are poor, yet are they rich in spirit. Who will encourage them?

LITERATURE.

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF JOHN TOMLIN WALSH, with biographical and historical sketches and reflections on contemporary men and things. Edited by a member of his family. Pp.171. Standard Publishing Co., Cincinnati.

It is with pleasure that we take up this little volume containing the record of a man of strong and original thought, and of firm convictions bravely maintained. The revival of the Anti-masonic reform had no sooner been announced than up from far North Carolina came a clear-toned, manful response. Dr. J. T. Walsh soon became, through his correspondence, well known to thousands of Northern Christians who blessed God for a man who had faith to discern the truth and maintain it, though standing alone. His contributions to the Cynosure showed a profound study of the lodge system, and were written in a terse, forcible, earnest style. He was for years elected vice-president of the N. C. A. for North Corolina; and also for years published a paper, The Watch-tower, in which he firmly maintained the argument against the lodge.

Dr. Walsh is still living, though in enfeebled health. He was appointed in 1884 an evangelist at large in the Disciple church, and is still at work for his Master. A fine lithographic portrait adorns the volume, and the same appears in the current number of the Disciple of Christ issued by the same company. The magazine contains a sermon by Dr. Walsh on "The Pre-eminence of Christ."

Among the attractions of the December fine art number of the English Illustrated Magazine will be a "Study of a Head," by Sir Frederick Leighton; "Fortune," also a "Study of a Head," by E. Burne Jones; "My Sweetheart," by G. L. Seymour; the "Wife of Pygmalion," by G. F. Watts, R. A.; the "Confession of Love," by F. A. Delobbe, and a "Scene in Heligoland," by Hamilton Macallum.

The senior partner in the great publishing house of Oliver Ditson & Co. (Mr. Oliver Ditson), has recently celebrated his seventy-fourth birthday. The foundations of this house were laid in 1835, and Mr. Ditson, who has been identified with its growth from the beginning, takes as active an interest in its affairs as ever. He is a rare example of the physical and mental vigor which may accompany the closest application to business.

Educators who believe in the value of the Kindergarten system, will welcome Miss Kate Douglas Wiggins "Kindergarten Chimes," recently published. Its hundred pages contain eighty-seven pretty and beautiful songs, admirably suited to this system.

"The Republican party will never become a Prohibition party. It may be trusted to support a more stringent regulation of the traffic than the Democratic party, but nothing more."—Harper's Weekly.

At a meeting of the Executive Board of the University of Chicago last week, a communication was received from Rev. Dr. George C. Lorimer, in which he declined to become the president of the institution, believing his vocation was the pulpit. But after consultation he agreed to take up the duties of the office for the time being. Should this arrangement become permanent the Masons would be called upon and the debt of the institution probably be paid, but with some arrangement which should put it permanently under lodge control.

An aged resident of Westport, Connecticut, will celebrate his ninety-fourth birthday this month. His wife is aged ninety-two. They celebrate their seventy-fourth wedding anniversary Thanksgiving week, when a son seventy-one years old, and a daughter nearly sixty, with a large number of grand and great-grand children propose to honor themselves by becoming the guests of the aged couple. Captain Taylor commanded a military company seventy years ago. His first votes, in 1812, were cast for Madison for President, and Roger Griswold for Governor of Connecticut. He has voted at every Presidential election since.

The St. Louis Advocate says: "One secret of the long life of Judaism is to be found in the fact that through centuries after centuries the law of Moses has been the first and deepest in the instruction of the children, and due and proper attention to the children is one of the most effectual means for building up the kingdom of Christon earth. The Catholics understand it. Within the first month of the child's existence, the hand of the priest is upon its head, and ever after a watch is kept over it. But many Protestants often manifest a strange blindness or stupidity in reference to the matter, and neglect the proper care of their children and wait till they have almost grown to maturity for them to become religious, acting as inconsistently as would a gardener who attempted to transplant trees instead of shoots or saplings."

THE HOME.

PRAYER.

When prayer delights the least, then learn to say,
Soul, now is greatest need that thou should'st pray.

Crooked and warped I am, and I would fain
Straighten myself by thy right line again.

Oh, come, warm sun, and ripen my late fruits;
Pierce, genial showers, down to my parched roots.

My well is bitter; cast therein the tree,
That sweet henceforth its brackish waves may be.

Say, what is prayer, when it is prayer indeed?
The mighty utterance of a mighty deed.

The man is praying who doth press with might
Out of his darkness into God's own light.

White heat the iron in the furnace won,
Withdrawn from thence 'twas cold and hard anon.

Flowers, from their stalk divided, presently
Droop, fall and wither in the gazer's eye.

The greenest leaf, divided from its stem,
To speedy withering doth itself condemn.

The largest river, from its fountain-head
Cut off, leaves soon a parched and dusty bed.

All things that live, from God their sustenance wait,
And sun and moon are beggars at his gate.

All skirts extended of thy mantle hold
When angel hands from heaven are scattering gold.

—R. C. Trench.

TYPICAL EXCELLENCE.

In purging Judah of abominable idolatries, and carrying forward other great and important reformations, King Josiah is said to have "turned not aside to the right hand or to the left." There was, in his times, a pressing demand for a straightforward reformer. The places and arrangements for idol-worship were abundant. Even in the Lord's temple were to be found "vessels made for Baal, and for the grove, and for all the hosts of heaven." Idolaters stood in the two courts of the Lord, and at the very doors were stabled "the horses that the kings of Judah had given to the sun." Incense was burned to the sun, and to the moon, and to the planets. Just beyond the eastern gate of the city were altars used for the worship of Ashtaroth, Chemosh, and Milcom, gods of the neighboring Zidonians, Moabites, and the children of Ammon; while in the valley bounding the city on the south, the devotees of Moloch were offering their sons and daughters as bloody sacrifices upon the most horrible of all the altars of idolatrous worship.

To the work of thorough reformation, Josiah applied himself with unyielding resoluteness. Nothing could turn him aside from his determined purpose to abolish idolatry and restore the worship of God in the desecrated temple, and throughout the ungodly land. Though a young man of scarcely more than a score of years, he engaged in the most unpopular and unwelcome of all the undertakings of his degenerate times, with a zeal which could not be dampened, and an energy that could not be in the least abated. Nothing could turn him aside from the course upon which he had conscientiously entered in his endeavors to remove existing evils of appalling magnitude. His perseverance was truly heroic, all honor to those who, like him, keep right on in the path of duty, regardless of all obstructions, so as to have for their commendation the testimony which he had, that "turned not to the right hand or to the left."

Certainly, if not obviously, more Josiahs are needed at the present time, to fearlessly do what is right in the sight of the Lord, if not of man, without turning aside to the right hand or the left. Hardly need it be said that churches are suffering deplorably for want of the Josiah type of piety, in the general prevalence of which, among professed Christians, there would soon be seen a new era in the cause of Christ. It would work as great a reformation in Christendom as was wrought in Judah when Josiah banished multiplied idols, repaired and beautified the temple of the Lord, and restored the neglected services of Jewish worship.

Piety of this stamp would introduce the most desirable changes into all religious movements, and give a new character to every Christian enterprise. Too evidently, there is not enough of unswerving devotion to the claims of Christian duty, but rather too much turning to either the right or the left, if not to both, in the discharge of the most imperative of all obligations; and thereby, religion suffers much reproach, and its prosperity is lamentably hindered. Of all worthy aims, none can properly be regarded as more worthy than that of doing right conscientiously and undeviatingly.—Watchman.

TURNED TO GOD FROM IDOLS.

Chang Tsu T'ai is a native of Chang-shan. Although forty-six years of age he is our junior helper in the Kinchau work of the China Inland Mission. He is at once an instance of the earnest seeker finding, and a monument of God's mercy. For eleven years, after one of the most straitest sect of their religion, he lived a Buddhist. He was both a celibate and a rigid vegetarian; and so thoroughly did he give himself up to that form of idolatry, that he invested 36,000 cash—£6 10s.—a large amount for a Chinaman—in the temple of his choice, and went to live there, not as a priest, but as a seeker after salvation. In order that he might attain the highest bliss offered him by this form of Buddhism, he underwent a long period of penance, by which he supposed he was accumulating great merit. For three years did poor Chang sit—with folded hands and closed eyes—in a small room "contemplating." He would only occasionally walk out into the small yard opposite his room, and would speak with no one but vegetarians of his sect, and with them only upon the one subject of their teachings.

These Buddhists suppose that according to the way in which the soul leaves the body, it will be hereafter happy or miserable. If the soul should leave the body by the crown of the head, it would then go to Nirvana, the Buddhist's Western Paradise; if it departed by the ear, it would be turned into some animal; if by the eye, into a bird; by the mouth, into a fish; by the nose, into an insect; but should it make its exit by the lower parts of the body, it would go to hell. It is, then, with a view to insure the soul's certain journey to Nirvana, that so many hard and strange things are done by the vegetarians. During the whole time Chang was engaged in his "contemplation," he was sad and unhappy, always fearing that after all he should not attain the object of his hope. A vegetarian friend of Chang's has never slept lying down for fourteen years, but always in a sitting posture, as that attitude is considered best calculated to cause the soul leave the body by the head. Numbers of these vegetarian devotees will regularly awaken about midnight, and sit up in their beds for an hour or so "contemplating," and this will be continued for years, until, indeed, the soul does leave the body; but, poor things, they know not the how nor the whither.

When Chang first heard of the Gospel, he held it in aversion, but in God's mercy he was at length led to think more seriously of the strange way of getting to heaven by resting on the merits of another —One most holy and most mighty, able to save to the uttermost, One who had full control over the other world, and was willing to receive poor sinners from this. . . . Chang's testimony for Christ is invaluable, and most men that he comes into close contact with for some little time hear the Gospel from his lips. One catechumen whom I hope to baptize soon, and two or three inquirers at Chang-shan, are all Chang's vegetarian acquaintances. May our gracious Lord lead them also into his truth, which alone can make them free.—Gospel in all Lands.

HOW RELIGIONS DIFFER.

The Missionary Herald mentions an illustration used by a heathen hearer to show the substantial equality of all religions. He said:

"Look you! From this spot, if I wish to go to Sewry, I can go by three routes,—there is the highway, there is a foot road, and there is a winding path by the river. Now just in the same way there are three roads to Heaven—you Christians go one way, Mohammedans go another, and we Hindus go a third."

The missionary, after showing that an illustration in itself did not prove anything, gave this one:

"Who does not know that good bread is made from a white sort of powder called flour? But chalk powder is also white, and so is arsenic. Does it follow, therefore, that chalk powder or arsenic will do to make bread with?

—There is much to be learned from the history of words. Julius Cæsar once declared that, with the whole Roman army at his back, he was not powerful enough to put a new word into the Latin language. But Daly, the manager of a Dublin theater, put one into our English tongue. He offered a wager to some friends that he could do it. They accepted the wager. He sent out men in every direction to mark with chalk on houses and fences, the letters Q-u-i-z. At once every one was enquiring, with puzzled look, what quiz meant, and the word passed into the language. But a different and much more interesting fact is, that the Greek word agape, rendered "charity" or "love" in our Bibles, is nowhere, in all Greek heathen literature, to be found. It occurs only in the Septuagint, and in the New Testament and other Christian writings. What a disclosure of the vileness with which the most cultivated and refined of all pagan nations of antiquity was saturated have we here! No word for love could be found in their language that was not so sodden in impurity as to be unfit for Christian use. As our missionaries dare not use the word for God in the heathen tongues, so the new conception of a pure and heavenly love must be clothed in a new word coined expressly to convey it.—Advance.

THANKSGIVING EVE.

A TRUE INCIDENT.

Hand in hand through the city streets,
As the chill November twilight fell,
Two childish figures walk up and down—
The bootblack Teddie, and sister Nell.
With wistful eyes they peer in the shops,
Where dazzling lights from the windows shine
On golden products from farm and field,
And luscious fruits from every clime.

"O Teddie!" said Nell, "let's play to-night
These things are ours, and let's suppose
We can choose whatever we want to eat;
It might come true, perhaps,—who knows?"
Two pinched little faces press the pane,
And eagerly plan for the morrow's feast
Of dainties their lips will never touch,
Forgetting their hunger a while, at least.

The pavement was cold for shoeless feet,
Ted's jacket was thin; he shivered and said,
"Let's go to a place and choose some clothes."
"Agreed!" said Nell, and away they sped
To a furrier's shop, ablaze with light,
In whose fancied warmth they place their hands,
And play their scanty garments are changed
For softest fur, from far-off lands.

"A grand Thanksgiving we'll have!" cried Nell,
"These make-believe things seem almost true;
I've most forgot how hungry I was,
And Teddie, I'm almost warm, arn't you?"
O happy hearts that rejoice to-day,
In all the bounty the season brings,
Have pity on those who vainly strive
To be warmed and fed with imaginings!

A THANKSGIVING DREAM.

The hired men were just rising from the table, where, after the usual California fashion, they had eaten their breakfast with the family.

Mr. Aiken looked up. "Jim," he said to one of them, "I think we ought to get through that job on the flat by Thursday night."

"Yes, sir," was the answer, "if we keep at it pretty steady."

"Well, there is nothing to hinder. I don't think the weather will change. Then there will be time to finish hauling the wood this week."

"All right."

"As the door closed Mrs. Aiken said to her husband, "John, Thursday will be Thanksgiving."

"Will it?"

"Yes; and I meant to ask you if you couldn't take a holiday, and let us all keep it as it ought to be kept?"

Mr. Aiken leaned back in his chair. "I don't see how I can without upsetting all my plans, Harriet. Holidays are very well for idle people who don't know what to do with their time, but they are a nuisance to a busy man."

Mrs. Aiken said nothing, and he went on:

"Besides, I don't see that we have had much to be thankful for this year. It has been one series of misfortunes—first your sickness, then Willie breaking his leg, and last of all, the barn burning up. No, I think we may leave it to other people to keep Thanksgiving Day."

And so saying the farmer rose and went out, quite satisfied that the matter was settled.

His wife sighed as she began to clear away the breakfast dishes. "Not much to be thankful for," she said to herself, with a strange wonder that she and her husband should see things in such different lights.

She had been ill in the spring, very ill indeed, but was it not cause for gratitude that her life had been spared, that she had been given back to her husband and children almost from the verge of the grave? Willie had broken his leg, but even in the midst of her distress and anxiety at the time she had been unspeakably thankful that he had escaped some worse injury, and the fracture had been so skillfully treated that it had left no sign of weakness. Then the burning of the barn in broad daylight, when there was no living creature inside, and on a calm morning when there was no danger of the fire spreading, even that, although it had been a loss in dollars and cents, had not seemed a very great calamity.

She was not much given to sighing. Life to her was a bright and pleasant thing, full of blessing and joy. A more cheerful and contented little woman it would be difficult to find. But now she sighed again, and wiped away a few quiet tears. She had set her heart upon keeping this Thanksgiving, and to give it up she felt to be a needless pain.

Was her husband growing hard and worldly—learning to care for nothing but mere outward prosperity? She ehecked herself with a sudden sense of shame. "Dear John," she said, remembering his tender care for her when she was ill, his sorrow for the little baby, who had lived but a few short days, his devotion to the children, his open-handed generosity to every one about him. How could she wrong him by such thoughts as these? If he worked early and late, and grudged himself a holiday, it was not for the mere love of gain nor for his own advantage. The shadow passed away from her heart, and she began to arrange another plan for the coming Thursday. A Thanksgiving dinner they should have at any rate; and in the afternoon she would go with the children for a ramble over the hills, if the day proved fine; in the evening she would ask the men to come into the parlor, and play and sing for them and try to give them a pleasant hour. So she said nothing more about a holiday, and Mr. Aiken gave the matter no second thought.

But sometimes even yet the angel of the Lord speaks to men's hearts in dreams and visions of the night. When the day was ended the farmer went to bed, and slept the deep, quiet sleep of a man in perfect health resting from honest work. Toward morning he awoke, and then for awhile he lay in that half-waking half-sleeping state where dreams are apt to visit the mind.

Was it a dream? Was it a memory? Or was it not something composed of both? Again the house was darkened, cautious footsteps moved lightly through the silent rooms, voices were never heard above a whisper, for the wife and mother lay dangerously ill. He came in from the barn just as he had eome on that sorrowful afternoon in the spring to find that the feeble spark of life in the little newborn daughter had suddenly gone out. But now it was not the baby that was dead; the kind neighbor who had been taking care of it sat beside the fire holding it in her arms, and tears were running down her cheeks as she tried to soothe its wailing cries. "Poor little baby," she murmured, "poor little motherless thing!"

With a deadly fear clutching at his heart he passed her and went into his wife's room. A rigid form lay on the bed, covered with a sheet; but even as he sank on his knees with a bitter groan a soft voice seemed to whisper in his ear, "She is not gone; she is given back to you. This is only what might have been."

"Thank God!" he fervently exclaimed; and suddenly the vision faded.

It faded, but gave place to another. He stood at the gate watching his eldest boy training his favorite colt. The pretty creature was full of life and spirit, but Willie was a good rider and kept his seat easily. Up and down the road they went several times, but at last, just as they were passing the gate, a hunter concealed by the willows in the creek unexpectedly fired his gun.

The frightened colt gave a leap to one side, and the boy was thrown. Had his head come in contact with the gate post? The father sprang to raise him with a dread he could not have expressed; but the boy looked up in his face with a brave attempt to smile. "Don't be frightened, father; it's only a broken leg, and that will mend; my neck wouldn't." And again, as he lifted the lad in his arms, he whispered, "Thank God! thank God!" And now it was midnight; he stood upon the hill overlooking his home; all was still; the inmates of the house were locked in slumber. Suddenly a bright light flashed from one of the windows, and in another moment he could see the curling flames filling all the rooms. He tried to shout, but his voice died in his throat; his feet were rooted to the spot; he could not move. With unutterable horror he saw the fire stealing from floor to roof; yet the sleepers did not awake. His wife and children—must he see them perish before his eyes? With a mighty effort he broke the spell that bound him, uttering a cry of agony, and at the same instant his wife's hand was laid upon his arm. "John! John! what is the matter?"

"Nothing," he answered, with a deep sigh of relief. "It was only a dream. Thank God, it was only a dream."

After that he slept no more. The words he had spoken three times echoed in his heart. "Thank God! thank God!" Had he anything to be thankful for?

"Harriet." It was not the imperative tone in which he sometimes spoke when she overslept herself in the morning. It was more like the voice of one who years ago had never uttered her name but in tones of tenderness. She was awake in a moment.

"Is it time to get up?"

"No, not yet; but I have something to say to you. I think I made a mistake this morning, dear. We will keep Thanksgiving, as you suggested."

"Oh, John, I am so glad!"

The unmistakable tremor in her voice smote him to the heart.

"Why, you foolish little woman, if you cared so much about it why did you not say so?"

"Beeause"—and now she had conquered the momentary emotion and spoke lightly enough; "because I never was a spoiled ehild. I was taught to take 'yes' or 'no' for an answer, without teasing, and I have never lost the habit."

"I don't think you have. But now make all your arrangements, and your programme shall be faithfully carried out."

If the men were surprised when they were told there was to be no work done on Thursday they did not say so, and they readily agreed to Mrs. Aiken's conditions that they should eat their Thanksgiving dinner and spend the evening with her.

It was a day to be long remembered, for from its dawn to its close everything went right. Such a cloudless sky, such a glorious sunshine. The drive to the neighboring village was delightful, for the large double-seated wagon was brought out, and the whole household went to church, to join in the service of praise and thanksgiving there.

Whether it was the late hour, or the previous drive, or whatever may have been the cause, never was a dinner a more complete success; from the splendid turkey to the mince pies everything was pronounced delicious. And when evening came a merry party gathered in the parlors There were games and songs in which the children took part; there were illustrated books and magazines to be looked over. Mr. Aiken read a short but beautiful and touching story; his wife played and sang unweariedly, and when the happy circle at last broke up there was a pleasant surprise for the little woman to whom the day had been so full of content.

Jim had worked for Mr. Aiken for more than a year, and no one had heard him speak an unnecessary word; he was a faithful worker, and that was all; if he had a heart he had always kept it out of sight. But now he came up to Mrs. Aiken and held out his hand.

"Good night, ma'am," he said, "and thank you very much. This is the first Thanksgiving I've had since I came to California, and that is ten years ago."

"That is not much to the credit of those you have worked for, Jim," said Mr. Aiken, "and I take part of the blame to myself; but there is one ranch in California where Thanksgiving is always going to be kept hereafter, and wherever you are you may count upon your welcome if you will come and keep it with us."

Mrs. Aiken's eyes were suspiciously bright. Were they sparkling with unshed tears? Her husband turned to her as they were left alone.

"Dear little wife," he said tenderly, "if all else were gone and you were left to me, I would have cause enough for a Thanksgiving Day." And then the tears overflowed, but they were tears of gladness.—Rural Press.

TEMPERANCE.

LINCOLN ON LIQUOR.

Mr. Luke C. Grimes, formerly City Librarian, and an aetive politician, has for thirty years taken a deep interest, at intervals, in temperance movements. During the Washingtonian temperance excitement, about 1853 or 1854, he was present at a meeting where the late President Lincoln made a speech, and the story of the interesting event, as told by him, is as follows: "One Sunday afternoon, in 1853 or 1854, I am not certain of the year," began Mr. Grimes, "I attended a meeting in the large hall on the top floor of the building on the southeast corner of Broome street and the Bowery. After an opening address by the presiding officer, the audience was called upon for

FIVE-MINUTE SPEECHES.

Many were made, but the material giving signs of being exhausted, Mr. Walford resorted to direct personal appeals, and addressing a person who was modestly seated in a remote corner of the room, said: 'Perhaps our friend in the corner will make a few remarks.' The audience instinctively, of course, gazed in the direction indicated by the speaker, and saw the gaunt, uncouth figure of a very tall man slowly arise from a seat. A half-suppressed titter ran through the assemblage at the appearance of the individual. He was clad in home-spun garments of a grayish color, which added to the quaintness of his aspect. So leisurely did he rise from his chair that it seemed he must be about 7 feet high. His complexion was sallow, his cheeks sunken, and his hair and beard were black—the latter slightly grizzled. But the most remarkable feature was his eyes; they were deep sunken in the soekets, jet black, and they glowed like coals afire, and impressed me with the fact that their possessor was no ordinary man. Well, at last he had risen to his full height, and he was seen to be of much more than average statue, but slightly stooped. After a deliberate survey of the audience for a minute or two he began to speak, and I tell you it was not long before the titter I spoke of gave place to and admiration, and he wasn't restricted to ths five-minute rule either. I can only give a mere outline of the address. He dwelt, of course, upon the evil effects of liquor-drinking, and illustrated his speech by many amusing anecdotes, but one feature I recall very distinctly, and that was a tribute he paid to his mother, in which he said that what success he had attained, and whatever force he had brought to bear to resist temptation he felt was due to the principle of self-reliance inculcated by his mother; that she always taught him that he was responsible for his acts, and could do either right or wrong, as he should choose. He said furthermore: 'In the far West, whence I come, rum has not yet made the ravages which mark its dread path in the crowded cities of the East, and I trust there shall never be found wanting earnest men to warn the pioneer that his labor will be useless unless he excludes from his presence the dread destroyer, rum!' These were the words of the speaker as near as I can recollect, but I reeall distinctly the concluding sentence of his speech, which was as follows: 'I am from the far West, on my way to Washington, and my name is Abraham Lincoln.' None of his hearers had ever heard the name before, but all realized that the owner was an able man. When the meeting broke up Mr. Lincoln passed out with the crowd, and I never saw him again till I was introduced to him at the Astor House in 1863, when, as he said, perhaps, prophetically, he was on his way to Washington to the Presidency and to his death."—New York Telegram.

SAD FATE OF A BRILLIANT MAN.

A brother of Mr. William Stead, the editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, lies in a nameless grave in the town of Clayton, Ala. "It was in 1872," says the Atlanta Constitution, "that Stead made his appearance in Clayton. He was a tramp, but gave evidence of having seen better days. Penniless and friendless, he gladly accepted odd jobs, and soon went to work as a landscape Gardener. To Prof. Johnson, then a teacher in Clayton, Stead confided the story of his life. It was the old story of drink and the train of evil which followed it. Rum had robbed him of family, fortune, and friends, and made him a vagabond upon the face of the earth. Again the demon seized him, and this time death put an end to his struggle and temptations. Prof. Johnson wrote to the great London editor, informing him of his brother's sad fate, and in due time a reply came acknwledging the relationship, and giv- the history of a brilliant but uncontrollable man. The prosperous editor begged the professor to communicate anything of a pleasant nature he might know about the outcast, but not to write any unpleasant tidings."

The druggists of Chicago, Ill., strenuously object to the special license tax which they are obliged to pay, and have submitted to the city council a pledge and protest, signed by nearly the entire trade, in which they set forth the indefensibleness on moral or legal grounds, of the selling liquor as a beverage, and denounce the practice, pledging themselves to guard carefully against the sale for other than medicinal and sacramental purposes, or alcohol for mechanical use; pledging also to assist, through their representative organization, in the prosecution of all druggists who shall violate these rules.

—Dr. Sheldon Jackson and the Rev. Alonzo E. Austin, on the 27th of September, received into the Presbyterian Mission church, at Sitka, Alaska, eleven members on profession of faith and baptism. Four of these having lived together, according to their Indian customs, as husbands and wives, sought and received Christian marriage.

THE CHURCHES.

—Bishop Milton Wright has been spending some time in Woodbridge, California, assisting in a revival.

—The Christian Convention conducted by Messrs. Moody and Sankey at Newburg, N. Y., for three days, closing Nov. 2, was very successful, and has led to a deep religious feeling throughout every church in the city.

—The principal of the Theological Seminary at Kioto, Japan, recently addressed the students of the Yale Divinity School. He informed them that thirteen churches have been formed in Japan within the last year.

—The ninth annual meeting of the Woman's Christian Association of this city was held last week at Farwell Hall. The report of the treasurer showed receipts, $12,550.13; current expenses, $7,024.34; deposited in permanent building fund, $5,356.86; balance in the treasury, $345.48; unpaid subscriptions to the building fund, $22,379. The Employment Bureau Committee reported 305 persons wanting employment, and that 158 employers had called. The president, Mrs. Leander Stone, in her annual address, urged the importance of continuing, with unabated energy, the work of securing subscriptions for the proposed building. It should be located, she thought, down town. She advocated the stationing of a Christian woman at every depot in the city to look after young girls coming to the city for employment.

—Rev. John A. Wilson, pastor of the First United Presbyterian church of St. Louis, having been elected synodical missionary, tendered his resignation as pastor, but the presbytery of Southern Illinois, after hearing the argument of the church committee, unanimously refused to break up the relations of the church and pastor.

—Rev. Dr. Robert Armstrong presented a paper before the late United Presbyterian Presbytery of New York on promiscuous dancing, which was read and adopted by presbytery. In this paper the presbytery warns all members and young people in our congregations and Sabbath-schools to avoid not only the practice of promiscuous dancing, but the places where it is practiced. It enjoins pastors and sessions to use all proper means to instruct the people of the evils of this practice, that in no circumstances will they engage in it. That as co-presbyters, we pledge each other our hearty support in endeavoring to entirely remove this evil from amongst us; that a committee be appointed to determine the extent of the evil and to report in regard to the necessity of any additional measures for its suppression; that pastors and elders of vacant congregations be instructed to inform their congregations in regard to the import of these resolutions and urge universal compliance with the same.

—The King of Siam has proclaimed the freedom of all religions tending to the moral improvement of the people.

—A notable fact!—While there was last year about seven converts to each preacher in the United States, there were seventy to each of the missionaries in Asia.

—The Emperor William, of Germany, has a chapter from the Bible read to him every day, immediately after dinner.

—There are fifty-four agencies and societies of various kinds connected with Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Tabernacle, London.

—A nephew of the King of Corea, a son of its prime minister, and the son of a military mandarin, have entered the Southern Methodist College at Shanghai.

—Two ladies 68 years of age collected the entire last year's salary of Rev. S. Earngey, pastor of the Methodist church at Morris, Ill. Mrs. Earngey graduated at Wheaton as Miss Hewes in 1869.

—A call has been issued for a meeting of the Baptist pastors of Iowa, to be held at Washington, Iowa, Nov. 17, and to continue two or more days for earnest prayer for a blessing upon themselves and churches.

—Sam Jones is preaching in Birmingham, Ala., and the reported conversons for the week ending Saturday night Oct. 31, are given at a round 600.

—The grand total of appropriations made by the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church this year, is $1,250,000. On Dec. 17 a grand missionary meeting will be held in New York Bishop Harris will preside, and Bishops Hurst and Fowler, and the Revs. Dr. Reed and Buckley will deliver addresses. Three hundred singers have been engaged.

—Pastor Seguin is continuing his mission among the Romanists from Detroit. He lately visited Schofield, Mich., where he was assailed by a mob during the night, which was finally dispersed without doing any personal injury. He writes of this trouble: "I spoke there four times last week on the subject of the Good Samaritan, and taking for my text. "What readest thou in the law?" I went on to explain the absolute necessity for us to read the Bible. I spoke of its clearness to uneducated people. The church (M. E.) was crowded every time. A mob was organized. Two Frenchmen and one Irish, all Roman Catholics, hired the services of forty drunken Irish beasts, and came to the house where I was stopping. Mr. Milford Preston, the owner of the house, told them they had better go to bed, otherwise they would find themselves in a grave the next morning. We scared them telling them we were well provided with arms." Next morning he made an effort to have several of the mob arrested, but the prosecuting attorney, being a Roman Catholic, would make no move in the matter of punishing the authors of the outrage.

—Our readers will remember that sometime ago Dr. Hays, then of Denver and now of Cincinnati, was sued for libel by Mr. Graham, the sheriff of Denver, for saying that the sheriff was the ally of lawbreakers. In the course of time the sheriff paid the costs and withdrew the suit. Since then the people of Denver have expressed their opinion of both these gentlemen. When Dr. Hays proposed to leave, not only the church and the presbytery, but the Chamber of Commerce, the newspapers and the other denominations presented their remonstrances. Three hundred convicts in the penitentiary sent him their plea to stay for their sake, and the Chinese begged him to stay as their friend. Last Tuesday the election came off, and Mr. Graham was a candidate for re-election. The county usually goes Republican by about 3,000 majority. This time Mr. Graham was buried under a majority of over 2,500 for his opponent.—Interior.

—Rev. Joseph Neesima, of Japan, addressed the [Chicago] Minister's Union last Monday. Referring to the progress of Christianity in that country, Mr. Neesima spoke of the favorable attidue of government, of influential men and of the press. This land, with its 37,000,000 of people, has its door wide open toward Christianity. The missionary is not only unmolested, for the most part, but welcomed, and police protection afforded him. In the sixteen years of missionary labor, between nine and ten thousand converts to Christianity have been made. While millions of dollars are still expended in idol worship, rearing new temples, and caring for old ones, the decay of idol worship is very evident. The days of bowing down to wood and stone are well nigh ended. There is a small remnant in the land of the Catholic movement of three centuries ago. Though so nearly extinguished for several generations, it yet serves to distinguish its adherents. They are more loyal to the government than their pagan neighbors. Later importations of Catholicism were reported as having made considerable progress throughout the empire. The government has provided 30,000 primary public schools, and made education compulsory for both sexes. Japanese scholars have done little as yet of original thinking. European literature is being freely translated, and unfortunately chaff as well as wheat goes into the literary hopper. Darwin, Huxley, and Spencer are read, and their pernicious influence is felt. Mr. Neesima sees peril in this that must be met. He urges higher Christian education and appeals for aid. —Advance.

—A very important conference on city evangelization is to be held in Cincinnati the second week in December, beginning on the 7th and closing on the 11th. It is to be interdenominational, and is designed to bring together, in the terms of the announcement, for discussion and suggestion, those who have given the deepest study to the various perils with which the cities threaten our civilization, and those who have been most successful in reaching the masses with Christian influence. The programme, so far as arranged, provides for ten papers, five on the evils and five on the remedies, as follows: Evils—"The Menace of the Modern City to our Civilization;" "Socialism;" "The Homeless Classes;" "Church Neglect, as Caused by the Strife between Labor and Capital;" "Sabbath Desecration." Remedies—"Christian Work for the Population of Foreign Parentage;" "A Religious Census;" "Sunday-school Mission Work;" "Evangelistic Methods;" "The Organization of a Church for Work;" "Question Drawer." Among those who are to participate in the discussions are Drs. Washington Gladden, E. P. Goodwin, R. M. Hatfield, R. S. Macarthur, A. H. Bradford, and A. F. Schauffler.

—The Swedish Lutherans celebrated the anniversary of Gustavus Adolphus on the 6th of November. Anniversary celebrations were observed throughout the Swedish synods on that day, the grandest, however, taking place at Augustana College, at Rock Islad, Ill. Probably no Lutheran institution in the land evinces such energy and can record such a success as this school. It is but a few years since Professor Weidner has been called there to the English theological chair, but now he states that about one-fourth of all the members of the Augustana Synod have been students at the school since he has been teacher.

—The opponents of Christianity in Japan have banded together to resist the spread of the Christian religion. Several such associations exist in different cities; but in no case do they appear to be numerous. In one instance, about twenty of them, carrying flags, inscribed: "Expel Christ, the Robber." entered a Greek Chapel; but caused no disturbance. In Osaka and Yokohama they have held public meetings; and in the former place, violence was used toward those who took the part of the Christians. Not infrequently the Buddhist priests are roused by the progress of the Christian religion to try to refute its doctrines. In one case, when Christian services were announced in a town where there is no church, the priests secured a room adjoining the building in which the missionary was to speak. A celebrated Buddhist orator was secured to defend Buddhism. The people went in large numbers to hear him; but when they found that his whole speech was to be a violent attack on other religions, they left, and went to hear the missionary who, without reference to Buddhism, preached a plain Gospel discourse. The people were pleased with it, and said: "If that is Christian teaching, Christianity is good. The priests," they said, "have a losing cause; they are not able to defend their religion.

RESOLUTIONS OF SYMPATHY FOR BRO. IMES, OF MEMPHIS.

Whereas, Rev. B. A. Imes, pastor of the Second Congregational church of Memphis, Tenn., because of his using his liberty to declare God's word, as he understands it, in reference to the evils of secret societies, has been repeatedly warned of danger to his person, and has also been notified to leave the city in two weeks; therefore;
